Claiming Forbes
For The Gay Nation

The ancient Romans had a time-honored policy that whenever they conquered a nation they would attempt to deprive that nation of its leaders. They reasoned that there was no better way to keep people docile and controllable than to separate them from what we would today call their "role models." It was a policy they pursued by murder, exile and blackmail. And the policy worked. Deprived of their native politicians, their philosophers, their literati, artists, thinkers and natural leaders, most nations annexed by Rome sank into centuries of provincial apathy.

Today, 20 years after Stonewall, the Gay Nation is in some ways similar to Rome's demoralized provinces. Although we could always count among our ranks some of the greatest Americans in every field, most gay leaders are prematurely and permanently snatched away from us by the dark tyranny of the closet.

This ongoing tragedy has two primary causes: the external hate generated against gays by society, and the paralyzing fear of straights' disapproval that springs from within gays ourselves. The first is more blatant, the second far more insidious.

Most role models who are closeted gays, like most gays generally, don't come out for fear that drastic consequences await them if they do. Yet for the slowly growing number of celebrities who have come out, the consequences are hardly as nightmarish as envisioned, and often have been genuinely positive. Openly gay members of congress keep getting reelected, gay pop stars keep having hit songs, lesbian athletes keep winning tournaments, gay authors remain on the best-seller lists. The fears of social and professional catastrophe that motivated people like Malcolm Forbes to remain hidden may have been well-founded in 1950 or even 1970; they're wildly exaggerated in 1990.

Yet it's impossible to demonstrate how unfounded those fears are unless leaders take the very plunge those fears prevent. And unless they do, the myth is perpetuated that respected, successful, famous, powerful and brilliant people aren't gay.

This is a tragedy for America and it's a tragedy for those who, like Forbes, needlessly cower in the closet. But the greatest losers are gay and lesbian youth. Like subjects of a vanquished Roman province, they seem destined to grow up not ever knowing that wonderful, winning people like Forbes are their soul mates and could be their inspiration in a hostile world. The tragedy of past generations is thus repeated. But now, 20 years after Stonewall, it's repeated needlessly.

So we say this to the youth of our tribe: There are idols you aren't allowed to dream of. There are thousands of invisible paragons you aren't allowed to know. There are lesbian movie stars and gay sports stars and famous gay writers and famous lesbian singers and gay scientists and lesbian poets and gay politicians and lesbian and gay geniuses. They are ours and, like them, Malcolm Forbes was ours. And in your names and for your futures we claim them all.
Stern (Hannah and Her Sisters, the narrator on The Wonder Years)—Stern says to Letterman something to the effect of "You people from Indiana only play sissy basketball."

OK. Fine. A commercial comes on—for Coors beer. "Figures," I think to myself. Five minutes later Bob Costas comes on. He's interviewing actor Peter Boyle. First thing they show is a clip of Boyle imitating Brando on an old Saturday Night Live: Boyle spits out, "What are you all a bunch of queers?!

Now I've had it—two gay sneers and one commercial for a notoriously homophobic company all within 15 minutes. Too much! Would a member of any other minority take such abuse? I remember what Bette Midler once said to the gay community! "Don't you people ever tire of continually being slapped around?" I get up and call NBC to complain. The woman on the other end of the phone is polite.

of Boyle from the film Joe. "You people are a bunch of Queers!"

It's 15 minutes later. Now I'm awake and mad. The 2 am repeat of the 11 pm news comes on. Four minutes into the newscast—Andy Rooney is coming back on the air.

Abre's Candied Yams

In his review of Crowbar (no. 37, March 11), Joe E. Jeffreys states that "Lionel Barrymore and Lillian Gish played the stage in Abie's Irish Rose," inadvertently insulting two fine actors and demonstrating a shocking deficiency in his own theatrical education.

Abie's Irish Rose was a sophomoric and sentimental comedy, much despised and sneered at by the theatrical community, written in 48 hours by Anna Nichols, an amateur who made more money than any other playwright had ever made before.

Critic and Algonquin Round Table wit Robert Benchley described the play as "the new depths to which the legitimate theater has sunk." In his weekly column in Life magazine, Benchley carried on a vendetta against the play, which nonetheless ran for 2,327 performances. "People laugh at this every night," Benchley complained, "which explains why democracy can never be a success." Later during its run he cried out, "Where do the people come from who keep this going? You don't see them out in the day time."

Benchley's exasperated comment that "in another two or three years, we'll have this play driven out of town" inspired lyricist Lorenz Hart to quip in his lyrics for the song "Manhattan": "Our future babies/We'll take to Abie's Irish Rose,/I hope they'll live to see/It close;"

The best criticism came from Benchley's fellow Round Tabler Harpo Marx, who damned the play with faint praise: "No worse than a bad cold."

Mr. Jeffreys owes an apology to the distinguished Miss Gish and the ghost of Mr. Barrymore, neither of whom would have been caught dead—or alive—in the Roaring 20s progenitor of Bridget Loves Bernie.

Joe E. Jeffreys Responds:
"You're right. I'm wrong. LIONEL BARRYMORE AND LILLIAN GISH NEVER APPEARED IN ANY PRODUCTION AT ANY TIME OF ABIE'S IRISH ROSE. Misinformation is dangerous fare. Take for example Karen Finley forever having to repute sticking yams up her ass. Thank you for pointing out the error."

Looking back over my notes on the production, I fail to understand how much a glaring mistake could have been made on my part. Miss Gish did, however, play the current Victory Theater in January of 1913 as Marjorie in A Good Little Devil. Mr. Barrymore played the stage in April of 1917 as Colonel Ibbeston in Peter Ibbeston.

I hereby throw myself upon the mercy of Miss Gish and the ghost of Mr. Barrymore pleading for no less a sentence than forever having to watch reruns of Fish Soup.

Straight to Hell

Since OutWeek has been active in the fight against all forms of homophobia, both inside and outside our communities, I have been appalled by the internalized self-hatred manifested in personal ads in which individuals identify themselves as "straight acting" and/or "straight looking," or indicate a desire to find people with those traits. This is insulting to both a healthy sense of lesbian and gay pride in general, and readers of the personas in particular. The assumption that "looking" or "acting" straight (as opposed to what? "Faggot? "Dyke? "Queer??) is a positive attribute is not only pitiful, it is offensive. Gay and lesbian communities revel with good reason in bending gender(s) and gender identities and offering a grab-bag of butches, femmes and everything in between, and the self-characterization "straight looking" is in direct contradiction to this often liberating self creation. "Butch/"Femme" can be categories constructed and appropriated by the individual as much to challenge and parody gender and heterosex as to imitate them, while "straight acting" makes a desirable virtue out of heterosexuality and an abhorrent vice out of the trappings of homosexuality.

Thus, I would suggest that OutWeek adopt the following policy:

1. The personals should feature a strongly worded statement articulating an opposition to such characterizations and explaining the reasons for this opposition.

2. OutWeek should, in the future, refuse to accept personal ads which contain that type of description.

While I understand the complexities of this stand, and potential responses that this measure would silence some forms of sexual or verbal expression, I think it’s vital to the health of our communities. While the use of terms such as "feminine," "masculine" or the like do little to break down the wails of (hetero)sexism, at least they do not dip with the self-hated "straight acting" makes for granted. Wanting—or being—someone "butch" or "femme" or "masculine" or "feminine," or someone forced to remain in the closet, can have the same effect as the description "straight acting/looking" but sends a very different message.

Moreover, such a policy on OutWeek’s part would not be financially detrimental. Several lesbian and gay publications have implemented this policy successfully; I believe it would benefit OutWeek to do likewise.

How to Make an Erse Curse
As a gay Irish-American, I thought Mike Neville’s "How to Make an Irish-American Faggot Scream" (no 20, Jan. 21) was hilarious. I posted it on my refrigerator and sent it to gay Irish friends out of the country. For Paul O’Dwyer to whine that the piece was "sneneric" (Letters to the Editor, no. 33, Feb. 11) was nothing short of damned silly. It was not "How to Make an Irish-American Faggot Flinch" or "How to Put Down an Irish-American Faggot," but how to make a gay gaelic scream. Get it, Paul? Or do you need a map?

One can only wonder how often, if ever, Mr. O’Dwyer has uttered a protest (or even a peep) against the hideous, medieval anti-sodomy laws of his native Ireland.

Buffer the Children?
In one respect, your editorial on Father Bruce Ritter (no. 36, Mar. 4) was pretty off-base. You say he could have had a "life-affirming, gay-positive influence" if he had opposed the policies of the Catholic Church from within and had been "more at ease with his nature." This is highly doubtful. If news stories about his having sex with young men from age 14 on are correct, this would put him in the long tradition of pederasty, i.e., love between a man and a youth. Do you really believe that a self-affirming boy-lover would be allowed to have such influence, either in the church or in the gay community? I do not wish to defend Ritter, who has built his career by opposing gay rights and consensual sex between men and boys. And you are right to point to the destructive dynamic of the closet—is it too much to hope that he is giving some thought to these considerations during his current ordeal?

But the fact remains that the options of gay men who love youths and wish to help provide them with needed services are pretty limited, especially in the wake of the child abuse and pornography hysteria of the past.

THE ONE THAT GOT AWAY...

Our crack team of researchers profoundly regrets having let this doozie by. In her February 28th "Living Section" piece on the gracious gourmet M.F.K. Fisher, New York Times writer Molly O’Neill embarks on a momentary flight of fancy: "She captured the dawn of adolescence in her first taste of oyster. Slurping the bivalve at a dance at her all-girl boarding school, 'I swallowed once, and felt light and attractive and daring,' she wrote. Just then, an older girl pulled the young epicure into a slow dance, and the feel of the oyster slipping down her throat was forever tied to her ensuing panic and intrigue."

FISH OR CUT BAIT...

Continuing an age-old tradition of to-ing and fro-ing, the fine people at Esquire have adorned their March issue with the following cover lines: "Burn the jerky ties. Trash the wimpy tweeds. Nuke the baggy suits. Lose the lumpy raincoat. Torch your closet." It seems today’s real man is an out-of-the-closet fashion queen who wouldn’t be caught dead in any wimpy get-up.

decade, to which, of course, Ritter—as well as some in the lesbian/gay and women's movements—contributed.

You say that Ritter would be a "hero to our community" if he had "gently" challenged homophobia from within the church. More power to those priests and nuns who are stirring up trouble inside the Roman Catholic Church, and let's hope they are not always "gentle." Surely, the church is one institution that has earned the hatred of homosexuals—and others—for centuries. But wouldn't it be more heroic, or at least liberating, for Ritter to leave an outfit that cannot seem to stop being an agency of oppression, and cast his lot with those who are struggling for sexual liberation? The trouble is that even if he were to do so, as a gay man who loved youths, he would not get funding from the state—or support from the gay community.

I earn much of my income as a prostitute and I have advertised in the gay press and will continue to do so.

Gays and the Jewish Establishment

What was the purpose of the "Liberal Hebes," "cruising for Jewish white trash," "neurotic-Jewish"? I don't find the use of such phrases funny. And the flip comment about "wet-suited Hitler Youths...found hanging ten..."? Doesn't Mr. Sadownicky know that an off-hand mention of a Nazi group in an article on a Jewish topic is bound to be construed as insensitive or even offensive? I found it both. I kept reading the article until its conclusion out of curiosity to see just how ridiculous it would get, and also to see if there would be any serious reporting in it. It got more ridiculous, but there was also some reporting in it, and some important points were made, unfortunately all but lost behind the offensive phrasing, which had nothing to do with... the substance of the article and the kitschy tone which detracted from what was important in the article.

Certainly, David Schulman was referring to the Jews of the Jewls "establishment" (synagogues, national organizations, usually very conservative on general lesbian and gay issues, too) when he said, as Mr. Sadownick reports, that there was "no concerted effort on the part of the Jews to light AIDS." But why did Mr. Schulman ignore Jews who have participated in ACT UP and other activist organizations? Perhaps it was partly an oversight and perhaps partly because not many Jewish gay and lesbian activists speak or write about their Jewishness in relation to their political activities. Why did a straight man give the AIDS talk at the conference? That's another story, not fully explained in the article. Why was there only one openly gay or lesbian rabbi moderating a discussion and one addressing the entire conference? Maybe because there are so few openly lesbian and gay rabbis. Why are there so few openly lesbian and gay rabbis? A few words about that in the article could have been enlightening. And Tikkun editor Lerner's "fetish for family values?" It's a position of Lerner's that has bothered me for a long time, too, and a position that clearly has implications inimical to the interests of Jewish lesbians and gay men. A little more discussion about that, a little more discussion about the protests staged by the lesbians and gay men at the conference, would have been in order. What kinds of actions against synagogues will be planned by those who protested at the conference? How are they organizing? I wouldn't know from this article.

There isn't exactly an abundance of reporting in the gay and lesbian press about gay and lesbian Jews, although there are issues to be discussed, so why virtually throw away the opportunity to present something of substance in this article? Open, uncloistered gay men and lesbians have been more or less locked out of organized, mainstream Jewish groups, especially synagogues, seminaries and other religious organizations. We have been locked out to a lesser extent from less mainstream Jewish groups, as evidenced at the Tikkun Conference in Los Angeles, but at least not totally silenced at such gatherings. Meetings like the Tikkun Conference provide an invaluable forum for advancing the ideas and demands of lesbian and gay activists. That's why I was excited to see that OutWeek had picked up news of the conference.

Unfortunately, as it was, the article wasn't as much of a service as it could have been. If OutWeek seeks to serve the diverse lesbian and gay community, that includes Jews, and so has an obligation to cover events like the Tikkun Conference. I think that OutWeek can and must do better.

To the Editor:

It's six weeks into the case of Dr. Veronica Prego who contends she contracted AIDS as a result of a contaminated needle prick to her finger ("Doctor's Testimony Is Disputed In AIDS Trial," 2/12/90). She is asking for $175 million in damages. Since the beginning of this trial we have been swamped with doom and gloom headlines about Dr. Prego's illness. We have heard Dr. Laurence say, "As a statistic, Dr. Prego has about a year to live..." We read about Dr. Prego having to leave the witness stand to refer to children with AIDS) an "innocent victim." One has to wonder if it were a person from a high risk group suing if this trial would be getting the same amount of compassionate attention.

Dr. Prego is not fighting for her life in this trial—she is fighting for money—at the expense of her life. And that is truly sad. There is a real possibility that she will eventually die from AIDS-related symptoms. Not because of a needle prick, HIV or even AIDS. But because she has already excepted this outcome for herself. Her whole case is built on the mis-informed idea that AIDS is always fatal. That there is no hope. And by painting the picture as dark and hopeless as possible around this "Innocent victim," before you know it, you have a great news story, not a "movie of the week."

I have compassion for Dr. Prego but not for the reasons she would like. When a person finds out that they have HIV, ARC or AIDS (or any life-threatening illness) they are faced with two choices. 1. "I will die from this." or 2. "I can live with this." Dr. Prego has clearly chosen the former and is asking to be paid for it. My sympathy for Dr. Prego is that she is playing the martyr in hopes of collecting $175 million and is living the rest of her life in misery.

But the real tragedy in this trial is not Dr. Prego or the hospital. It's all the people who have AIDS concerns and are scared. All the people who are trying to live with this the best they can. So many of their hopes and dreams have been discredited by the mountain of mis-information that has been used as evidence, accepted and reported as fact in this trial.

There is no way of ever knowing how Dr. Prego got HIV. It's also never been proven that HIV is the sole cause of AIDS. At best it might be a co-factor in this disease. No human being, including Dr. Laurence, can predict how long another human being has to live. Nor can anyone predict when someone might experience a self-healing, miracle or, as the medical profession calls them, a spontaneous remission. But they do happen every day. And most importantly is that not everyone who has AIDS will die from AIDS. Throughout history there have been plagues and life-threatening diseases but there were always survivors. We are living proof of that. AIDS is no different.

I'm involved with three AIDS-related support groups a week. They each have a different focus from alternative non-toxic therapies and information, to medication and stress reduction, to discussions of God, spirituality and love. All of these life-affirming groups share the common thread of self-empowerment and hope. This trial has come up in all three groups and I have seen how all this negative misinformation has affected people. We might not know what tomorrow holds but we do know this. There is no such thing as "dying from AIDS." You are either alive or you are not! The day you give up your will to live is the day you die.

Where there is a will to live there are survivors and where there are survivors there is hope. There is always hope.

New York State Vetoes Phone Sex Ban

by Gabriel Rotello

ALBANY - Gay and AIDS activists and civil libertarians scored a victory Wednesday when New York State rejected an attempt to ban phone sex services in the state. Despite the state level victory, however, lawyers stressed that the threat to the services from federal legislation is still very much in force. They said they would be filing lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the federal statute this week, and that without such lawsuits the phone services might still be interrupted as early as next Thursday.

The victory in New York came at a meeting of the Public Service Commission in Albany. The commission, which oversees the operations of New York Telephone and other utilities, turned down NY Tel's request to change its rules governing phone sex.

The phone company had filed those new rules with the commission last month, asking to be allowed to implement changes that would have terminated the sex services. One change would have allowed the phone company to cease its current practice of billing sex-line customers and passing the revenues on to the phone sex companies. The second would have blocked public access to the lines unless customers requested such access in writing. Analysts had maintained that either rule, if enforced, would have put the IPs out of business.

Phone Company Derided

In rejecting the new rules the commission made it clear that the state's policy is to comply with the new federal legislation in the least restrictive way possible. Several commissioners indicated that NY Tel had attempted to go far beyond the mandate of the federal law in this case.

"The company's request to cease billing is not even mentioned by the federal law," said Commissioner Eli Noam in rejecting NY Tel's rules.

In remarks scathingly critical of NY Tel's approach, Noam said, "The phone company keeps trying to change our minds on these issues. All of us here should start to be really upset with the company."

Noam derided the request to cease billing for phone sex, comparing it to a credit card company's refusal to accept charges for goods it disapproved of. Calling the phone company "the information highway of society," he maintained that it is not the business of the highway to worry about what kind of traffic passes over it.

"The phone company is in a situation most businesses would die for," he said. "They're in a position midway between businesses and their customers. If they learned to take advantage of that position they could reap billions each year, and we would be lowering rates for everyone. And yet, instead of taking advantage of this advantage, they're trying to throw it away. They'll lose six or seven million a year on this, and then come to us to raise the rates to make up for it."

In a direct reference to the safer sex implications of the issue, Noam held up a copy of the full page ads which Safe Call, a coalition of gay, AIDS and civil liberties groups, had placed in the Village Voice protesting the proposed new rules.

"There is clearly another perspective on this issue," he said, contrasting the ads with opinions of right-wing pressure groups. "There are other sides, other people involved."

The chairman and several other members of the seven-person commission expressed agreement with Noam's views. The one dissenter was Commissioner MacFarland, an upstate Republican long opposed to phone sex companies.

Least Restrictive Compliance

Acknowledging the impending federal statute, which takes effect March 22, the commission instructed NY Tel to comply with the law in as unrestrictive a manner as possible. The federal law, sponsored by Senator Jesse Helms, mandates that information providers (IPs), as the phone sex companies are known, which offer "adult" services must restrict access to their services only to customers who write in to "pre-subscribe."

The commission instructed the company to only mandate pre-subscription if an IP "voluntarily self-certified" that their service is adult in nature. If an IP self-certified that their service is not adult, or if the IP refused to self-certify at all, the phone company must accept the status quo and not interrupt that IP's service.

Asked what would happen if an IP which was obviously adult in nature did not self-certify or lied in doing so, a commissioner responded that nothing would or should happen. "It's not our business to enforce an ambiguous federal law," he said. "That's between the IP and the federal government."

Some commissioners expressed the opinion that the Helms law was unconstitutional and would possibly be successfully challenged in federal court.

New York Telephone is now required to draw up new rules in keeping with the mandate of the commission, With the deadline of the federal law fast approaching, and no commission meeting scheduled soon, those new rules may be approved by a single commissioner without the formality of a hearing.

Lawyers Still Apprehensive

Despite the victory on the state level, lawyers for both phone sex users and providers stressed that the main battle is still shaping up in the federal courts.

Joel Dichter, a lawyer retained by the IPs, said that he would be filing a constitutional challenge to the Helms law this week in the Southern District of New York Federal Court. The New York Civil Liberties Union and Lambda Legal Defense Fund were also planning suits this week on behalf of phone sex users. Lawyers said that the two suits would probably be united by the courts.

Once the suits are filed, lawyers will attempt to obtain temporary restraining orders which would prevent the government from interfering with the phone sex operations while the larger constitutional issues are decided. It was unclear whether they will be successful in this attempt.

It was also unclear what the intentions of the federal prosecutor were in New York. Some lawyers expressed the opinion that with the actions of the Public Service Commission, it was unlikely that a federal prosecutor would be likely to proceed against IPs in New York. Others disagreed, noting that in a similar case which went to the Supreme Court last year, federal prosecutors had moved in on the IPs despite regional opposition to a ban on phone sex services.

Court Nixes Visitation Bid
By Lesbian Co-Parent

by Arthur S. Leonard

NEW YORK—An appeals court in Brooklyn ruled March 2 that Alison D., the lesbian co-parent of a nine-year-old boy, was not entitled to a court hearing on her request for visitation rights after the breakup of her relationship with the boy's mother, Virginia M.

The 3-to-1 majority opinion agreed with Supreme Court Justice James D. Benson of Dutchess County, who ruled in July, 1988 that Alison was not a "parent" within the meaning of the New York Domestic Relations Law, which reserves to "parents" the right to claim visitation to a child. Justices Joseph J. Kunzeman, Guy J. Mangano and Milton Mollen, who was recently appointed Deputy Mayor for Criminal Justice by Mayor David Dinkins, made up the majority.

Although earlier decisions by the Court of Appeals, New York State's highest court, have held that those other than "natural parents" could contest visitation rights in "extraordinary circumstances," the appellate panel found that Alison's case did not qualify for such treatment. Alison and Virginia M. began living together in March 1978, and jointly planned to raise a family using donor insemination. Virginia M. bore their son in July 1981. Their relationship ended in 1983, but Virginia allowed Alison liberal visitation rights until 1987, when Alison moved to Ireland for a year to pursue a job opportunity. Virginia moved without notifying Alison of her new address, cut off all contact with the child and refused to allow renewed contact when Alison returned to New York.

Paula Ettelbrick of Lambda Legal Defense Fund, who argued Alison's appeal on January 8, said, "We're very disappointed in the court's decision, and we feel that the court relied too heavily on a case that was easily distinguishable from this one."

Ettelbrick was referring to Ronald F.F. v. Cindy G.G., a 1988 decision in which the state's highest court denied visitation rights to the boyfriend of a single mother who was proven not to be the biological father of her child, holding that the situation did not meet the "extraordinary circumstances" rule. That case did not involve any agreement between the parties to raise a family together.

"Alison really wants to appeal," said Ettelbrick. "We can't just let this opinion sit, because this is devastating to everyone, not just lesbian co-parents," due to its broad application of the Ronald F.F. case. The Alison D.

AIDS Inmates
Sue Cuomo Over Prison Policies

by Arthur S. Leonard

NEW YORK—The Legal Aid Society filed a massive lawsuit against Governor Mario Cuomo and the administrators of the New York State Department of Correctional Services in federal court in Albany on March 6, charging multiple violations of the constitutional rights of state prisoners with HIV infection and AIDS. The lawsuit, which has been assigned to U.S. District Judge Thomas J. McAvoy, was brought in the name of ten anonymous prisoners with AIDS on behalf of all present and future HIV-infected prisoners.

Legal Aid attorney William Rold, announcing the lawsuit at a press conference in New York City, stated, "There may be as many as 7,000 inmates with HIV infection, but current funding proposals are tens of millions short of what is needed." He also stated that plaintiffs hoped that "the act of filing the lawsuit itself will be helpful in the budget process going on." New York State's fiscal year begins April 1, and all key players in state government are now engrossed in negotiations over the new budget.

The 64-page complaint asserts that Cuomo, Corrections Commissioner Thomas A. Coughlin III and other prison officials have failed in their duties under the constitution to provide appropriate care for prisoners affected by the epidemic, resulting in cruel and unusual punishment forbidden by the Eighth Amendment and violation of rights of privacy and due process of law under the 14th Amendment.

At press time, Amy Colodny, a spokeswoman for the New York State Department of Corrections, said she could not yet comment on the lawsuit itself because she had not yet seen a copy of the actual papers, but she called AIDS "our major budget initiative."
Colodny said the department is "very, very concerned about AIDS, and we would love to be able to do more things. But in times of tight fiscal constraints, it's difficult."

A spokesperson from the governor's office did not return phone calls by press time.

Of the 50,000 state prisoners, about 17 percent are believed to be HIV-infected, yet the state lacks any coordinated program for dealing with AIDS in prisons. More than 800 prisoners have already died from AIDS, and about 800 more are now known to be living with AIDS as defined by the Centers for Disease Control within the state system, but each individual prisoner is left largely to its own devices to secure treatment, order medications and decide on how to deal with AIDS issues, according to the complaint. The lengthy complaint provides chapters and verse on the lack of coordination, inadequate services and inhumane living conditions suffered by prisoners with AIDS.

Among the most serious charges are: massive breaches of confidentiality about the HIV status of individual prisoners; lack of access to physicians despite obvious symptoms of serious illness; extended delays in providing prescribed medication; inadequate or nonexistent counseling for prisoners who test positive; and deprivation of medication, access to appropriate care or reduced food rations as punishment for behavior which is—in some cases—attributable to AIDS-related mental impairment.

Death before diagnosis

The complaint also charges that lack of care has resulted in many prisoners dying before their conditions could be diagnosed, and cites studies showing that prisoners with AIDS survive only a third as long as similar persons diagnosed outside prisons. In fact, according to attorney John Gresham of Prisoners Legal Services, who attended the press conference, prisoners with AIDS fare less well than homeless persons with AIDS who depend upon public shelters and public hospitals for their treatment.

The complaint includes detailed histories of treatment of the plaintiffs. It is hard to know whether "Kafkaesque" or "Dickensian" is a more appropriate description for these histories. They provide a litany of delays, misinformation, incorrect treatment, inhumane living conditions and official indifference to pain and suffering.

At the press conference, a paroled prisoner with AIDS, William Diffley, who spent 14 months in the special AIDS unit at Sing Sing, said that the case histories were accurate. He said that "people have actually lapsed into comas when prescribed medication was delayed or not properly administered," and that HIV-positive inmates were denied contact visits with parents, grandparents, siblings and children, in addition to the denial of conjugal visits with spouses upheld by the state Court of Appeals a few years ago.

Asserting that "people are dying unnecessarily in prison," Diffley claimed that "the system needs such an overhaul that it makes economic sense to release people for outside treatment." His stark conclusion: "It seems to be an unspoken policy to let them die."

The complaint asserts that Commissioner Coughlin and his deputies are aware of many of these problems as a result of reports by a variety of independent agencies and associations, but have done virtually nothing to correct the. The complaint also charges that Governor Cuomo has impounded funds appropriated for dealing with AIDS education and treatment during the past two state fiscal years.

The lawsuit seeks a court order barring the state "from subjecting prisoners with HIV infection and AIDS] to the illegal and unconstitutional conditions of confinement described in this complaint" and requests the court to oversee compliance with its order.

Several other organizations showed support for the lawsuit by attending the press conference. Among those represented were Prisoners Legal Services, Gay Men's Health Crisis, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Correctional Association of New York, which has issued several reports calling on the state prison systems to radically upgrade the quality of their AIDS programs.
Local Latino Groups
Eye National Focus

Mizzette Fuenzalida, executive director of Washington D.C.-based LIEGO, began by asking the gathering to name the issues faced by the Latina(o) lesbian and gay community of New York. They included anti-violence, child custody, domestic partnership, AIDS and lesbian and gay rights in general. She pointed out that those were some of the same issues raised by communities she has addressed across the country.

Louis Ortiz, co-chair—along with Isabel Santos—of New York's Hispanic United Gay and Lesbians (HUGL), said that later that night he spoke to Fuenzalida and explained to her the position in which HUGL is at the present time, "I can't speak for the body of HUGL, but I explained to her the process of reorganization we are going through. My personal feeling is that a lot of work has to be done within the organization and I can't extend myself personally to a national organization. We have to be organized locally before we start that process nationally."

Other local organizations with members present at the meeting were Las Buenas Amigas, the Boricua Gay and Lesbian Forum, the Latina(o) Caucus of ACT UP/NY and three members of Philadelphia's Fuego Latino.

The idea for LLEGO evolved in 1986 at a series of national lesbian and gay conferences. Its first formal meeting was held during the 1987 March on Washington. The second meeting was held in Los Angeles in February, 1988 where participants drafted bylaws and selected the name LIEGO, an acronym which means 'it has arrived' in Spanish. LIEGO has an interim board of directors consisting of 12 people: two men and two women from each of the Eastern, Central and Western regions of the country. Both the Central and Western regions have elected representatives to the board already. At one point, Fuenzalida attempted to turn the room's attention to begin the selection of Eastern representatives by calling for nominations for an upcoming regional election.

"This is your turn now," said Fuenzalida. "If you are ready, let's move on. We will take nominations."

But before nominations could be brought to the floor, some audience members voiced concerns about the need for local organizations to meet and discuss the issues presented by LLEGO before jumping into an election.

"I would have liked to have seen LLEGO give us more time between this meeting and the call for nominations," said Daisy Dejesus, co-treasurer of Las Buenas Amigas. "The invitation was for a reception. They never told us anything about elections. I am not here representing Las Buenas Amigas. Without the consensus of all the members we cannot make decisions."

Las Buenas Amigas—Formed three years ago out of a small collective of women. Today it has a core of 15 members who attend monthly meetings held on the first and third Sunday of each month at the Center on 13th St. It has over 100 women on its mailing list. They receive a bimonthly newsletter. There are no membership fees or dues.

"Our structure is based on a collective consensus model," explained Daisy Dejesus. "We don’t have a board of directors. We only have two officers in the organization—two treasurers. Each meeting we rotate the chair and give everybody an opportunity to try out their group dynamic skills."

Members of Las Buenas Amigas will be attending the 2nd annual Latina Conference to be held in Costa Rica in April. Amigas has donated $1,000 to the organizers of the conference and is organizing a fundraising effort to offer financial assistance to its members who plan to participate in the conference.

For more information, contact Dejesus at (212) 477-1527.

Boricua Gay and Lesbian Forum—Formed three years ago during the March on Washington out of a group discontent with the lack of support from the Puerto Rican Civil Rights Organization. Today it has about 35 members who attend the monthly meetings held at the Center. It has 600 people on its mailing list. There is a membership fee. Members must be in accordance with the bylaws and participate in one of the work committees.

"We have an executive committee made up by the five persons who started the organization," explained Luis Nieves. "Each of us in charge of one of the work committees. We have a set of bylaws and this year we are working to update our agenda."

According to Nieves, membership is not restricted to Puerto Ricans, but the issue will be brought up to the table in the near future. "If we are going to be a community of conscience, we can’t start out divided."

Members of the Forum are planning to attend Somos Uno, the state conference of Latino legislators. Some of the issues the Forum plans to present are health care for gay men and lesbians, abuse of controlled substances, domestic partnership, gay and lesbian youth, violence and discrimination, child custody and adoption, and gay and lesbian rights in general.

For more information, contact Pedro Velazquez at (212) 293-0833.

Hispanic United Gays and Lesbians (HUGL)—Formed four years ago, today it has about 50 members who attend the monthly meetings held on the fourth Thursday of each month at the Center on 13th St. It has over 200 people on its mailing list. HUGL will start publishing a monthly newsletter in the near future. There is a membership fee.

"We are in a process of reorganization," explained Louis Ortiz. "We are working on a draft of the bylaws which will be presented to the membership for approval. We have a steering committee that organizes and does the planning for the organization. The co-chairs do not direct what the organization does."

Army Wants Gay Cadet to Return ROTC Money

by Rex Wackner

Adding a new twist to its anti-gay policies, the Army’s Reserve Officer Training Corps is asking that a $25,000 scholarship be returned by a college senior who realized he was gay and came out of the closet.

The early March ruling by an ROTC hearing officer came in the case of 24-year-old James Holobaugh, a senior at Washington University in St. Louis.

Holobaugh had been an ROTC favorite prior to being blacklisted, appearing in an ROTC national recruitment advertising campaign and performing at the top of his class in St. Louis.

The Department of Defense has not previously asked for scholarship money to be returned unless a particular gay or lesbian lied about his or her sexual orientation to gain admittance to ROTC programs. DOD policy rejects all homosexuals as unfit for military service.

But in the case of Holobaugh, the hearing officer found no evidence of deceit. Holobaugh was dating women when he entered the ROTC in 1984 and did not realize he is gay until late in 1988. He promptly reported his gayness to ROTC officials.

In retrospect, Holobaugh says it might have been better to keep his sexual orientation a secret, but he added, “I’m also glad I’m not trying to hide anything.”

Holobaugh plans to fight the ROTC ruling with the support of the American Civil Liberties Union and Washington University.

Washington University provost Edward Macias, in a letter to university ROTC commander Lieut. Col. Robert Bates, called the military’s anti-gay policies “inconsistent with the nondiscriminatory values of this (and I should think virtually all) universities.”

He urged the ROTC to drop its plans to seek reimbursement from Holobaugh.

Washington University is at least the eighth major university to tackle the military’s homophobia, following in the footsteps of the University of California, Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin, and Harvard, Yale and Northwestern.

ROTC provides 70 percent of Armed Forces officers and offers programs at 318 colleges and

by Rex Wackner

60 Minutes commentator Andy Rooney, suspended by CBS Feb. 8 for homophobic and possibly racist remarks he made in public, was back on the air March 4, more than two months before the three-month suspension was to expire.

In his regular 60 Minutes segment, Rooney strongly defended himself against the charges that he is a racist, providing a litany of pro-Black steps he has taken in his public life.

The list included once kicking out of his home a guest who repeatedly used the word “nigger,” sitting in the back of the bus with Blacks when he was in the Army and writing a television program called “A Black America” for Bill Cosby in 1968.

Rooney also made an effort to clear the air with “homosexuals” during the broadcast. But many gay and lesbian activists are saying the attempt was unsatisfactory.

Rooney’s March 4 remarks about gays, in full, were:

“I’d be known for the rest of my life...as someone who had made life a little more difficult for homosexuals.... How do I apologize to homosexuals for hurting them with a remark I made that I didn’t realize would hurt them? It’s demeaning to have to sit here and defend myself.”

And, in relating the story about ejecting the racist guest from his home, Rooney added, “I’d feel the same today if anyone used an insulting word about homosexuals.”

In closing, Rooney asked: “Do I have any opinions that might irritate some people? You’re damned right I do. That’s what I’m here for.”

Rooney’s suspension at CBS reportedly triggered a massive mail and phone protest from viewers as well as severe peer criticism for CBS News president David Burke, who made the decision.

Many of Burke’s peers charged that CBS was denying Rooney freedom of speech, but they were mostly angry that Burke seemingly took the word of gay reporter Chris Bull over that of Rooney.

Bull had said that Rooney told him Blacks have watered down their genes because the least intelligent ones get pregnant, but Rooney has denied making that remark. Rooney’s suspension immediately followed publication of the

Senate Narrowly Upholds D.C. Gay Rights Law

by Cliff O'Neill

WASHINGTON—The U.S. Senate narrowly defeated a surprise measure March 1 that would have exempted volunteer youth programs from the District of Columbia's stringent gay and lesbian rights law. The vote followed hours of heated debate and intense behind-the-scenes negotiations.

The anti-gay proposal, introduced the evening of Feb. 26 during debate on the unrelated National and Community Service Bill (S. 1430), was defeated by a razor-thin 47 to 50 margin when senators refused to table a substitute measure.

The original amendment, sponsored by Sen. William Armstrong (R-Colo.), would have created a loophole in the D.C. human rights code allowing any volunteer organization which "educates, coaches, or trains any minor, or holds out the adult as a role model, mentor or companion" to discriminate against gay and bisexual persons.

The successful substitute measure, sponsored by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), instead put the focus on "homosexual, bisexual or heterosexuals" convicted and accused child sex abusers and allowed parents final say on their children's counselors. After Armstrong's motion to table it was defeated, the substitute rider went on to pass 97-1, with even Armstrong voting for it.

The landmark vote, the first such vote in the Senate upholding the D.C. lesbian and gay rights law, comes only two weeks after senators overwhelmingly defeated a fiercely anti-gay measure from

Fight Begins to Preserve Mass. Rights Law

BOSTON—Gearing up to fight a referendum campaign that could repeal Massachusetts' hard-won lesbian and gay civil-rights law, a coalition of lesbian and gay and progressive organizations has formed a campaign committee. At the conclusion of a lengthy, contentious community-wide meeting February 24, a campaign committee structure was hammered out, and six seats on the 11-member steering committee were filled.

Deep disagreements over how the campaign committee should function, however, threaten to divide the coalition before it has even begun to work on the campaign. At a steering committee meeting held last week, a number of activists angrily walked out, and at one point, an organization seated on the steering committee threatened to leave.

"The problem is that there are a number of people who are members of different organizations with different strategies, one activist said, "and they are members of different organizations for a reason. They can't work together."

At the community-wide meeting that elected organizations to the steering committee, different proposals, with a common emphasis on working committees, were considered for the structure of the campaign committee. The meeting's approximately 150 attendees chose a strongly centralized structure with a small steering committee over a much larger decision-making body which would have guided autonomous working groups. As a compromise between those proposals, the group elected to empower an advisory committee, made up of organizations and individuals throughout the state who wished to participate in the campaign, to oversee the steering committee's decisions.

But when the initial members of the steering committee met, a motion that would have set key committees to work immediately was voted down, angering a number of activists who are eager to get the campaign in gear on the local level. Mutual trust was sorely lacking, a number of observers pointed out, hampering the steering committee's ability to formulate a rational strategy that all the members would support.

At the same time, many activists are encouraged that organizations with radically diverging agendas and methods of working have been able to work together even this far.

"Two very different forces have been making attempts to make compromise and blend their visions into a cohesive campaign," commented David LaFontaine, a member of the Coalition for Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights, one of the organizations represented on the steering committee. "There's been more communication, simply because we're all sitting on the same steering committee. I feel hopeful about it."

Since the civil-rights law was enacted last November, Massachusetts Attorney General James M. Shannon has ruled that a referendum on the law would be unconstitutional because amendments to the bill exempt religious institutions from the scope of the law. In Massachusetts, no law relating to religion, religious practices or religious institutions can be subjected to a referendum petition.

Citizens for Family First, the organization opposed to the anti-discrimination law, however, has appealed the attorney general's ruling to Massachusetts' highest court. Until the court's decision is handed down—possibly as early as April—both sides will go forward with their campaigns. —Nina Reyes

"Having voted against Helms without the world caving in on them, I think now senators realize they can vote against Armstrong," commented Greg King, communications director for the Human Rights Campaign Fund.

Armstrong's unexpected amendment came in response to the resolution of a controversy between D.C. gay and lesbian activists and the local chapter of Big Brothers in which, ending years of contention with the gay community and the D.C. Office of Human Rights, the organization last fall repealed its policy of banning gay men from becoming volunteer youth counselors.

"Homosexuality has long been scorned by mainstream people as anti-social and destructive behavior," argued Armstrong on the Senate floor. "In fact, until quite recently, homosexual behavior was unlawful in most jurisdictions, and in my view, properly so." Kennedy, however, argued that, even if such an amendment was needed, it shouldn't single out homosexuals and bisexuals. "The law shouldn't assume that any class of persons is a threat to children," he said.

The Armstrong measure came as a complete surprise to gay and lesbian activists, although they were given a scant 30 minutes of warning when staffers at the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force were tipped off by a Colorado newspaper as to what Armstrong was planning.

Operating quickly, Task Force staffers were able to hastily rally a coalition of lobbyists for gay rights, civil liberties and District home rule to come up with the substitute amendment battle plan. Meanwhile, realizing he could stave off a vote on Armstrong's amendment measure until the next morning, Kennedy bought anti-amendment forces a night of strategizing by employing parliamentary stalling tactics as soon as Armstrong introduced his rider.

Once the debate began the next morning, Armstrong railed against lesbian and gay rights, deriding homosexuality as "anti-social, a form of aberrant behavior" and "destructive of individuals' families and communities." Neither did Armstrong conceal his disdain for the District, calling it "one of the most..."
Senators Hail Care Bill for AIDS "Quake"

WASHINGTON—Senate leaders unveiled a massive AIDS care and disaster relief package at a Capitol Hill press conference March 6, bringing in actress and fundraiser Elizabeth Taylor to help them draw attention to the ongoing lack of access to treatment by people with AIDS and the mounting health care crisis in hard-hit cities nationwide.

To face the problems of the ongoing crisis, Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) announced their introduction of the Comprehensive AIDS Resources Emergency (CARE) Act of 1990, a massive package which would provide $600 million in emergency aid to cities and states hit particularly hard by the epidemic and would expand access to treatment to early intervention services for the HIV infected.

"AIDS is unmercifully killing people—people I know and love, and, I suspect, people you know and love," said Taylor, founding national chairperson of the American Foundation for AIDS Research. "But sadly, the darkest days of the AIDS crisis still lie ahead of us. Hundreds of thousands of lives hang in the balance unless we begin to confront AIDS as a true national emergency."

In her remarks, Taylor vowed to "not stop fighting" and "not be silent" until the Kennedy/Hatch bill is passed by Congress.

A day earlier, Taylor had met with First Lady Barbara Bush to lobby her and the president on the bill and other AIDS issues. "America responded within days to the California earthquake," stated Kennedy in introducing his bill. "We have pledged tens of billions to rescue the savings and loan industry. AIDS is a comparable disaster and we need to respond effectively." Pointing out that a friend of his was featured on the large square from the Names Project AIDS Memorial Quilt which served as a backdrop to the press conference, Hatch outlined the bill's provisions, calling for "compassion and tolerance" of all those affected by AIDS and predicting that the bill would be supported by the Bush administration. "I believe the administration will be looking at this very carefully," said Hatch, adding that the $600 million price tag of the bill is still "not enough" to face the increasing demand of the epidemic.

Speaking to the massive number of reporters at the press conference attracted by Taylor's appearance, National AIDS Commission member Belinda Mason called it "sad" that it took a celebrity's appearance to draw attention to the landmark AIDS bill.

"I think it's wonderful that [Taylor] does the work that she does for us," said Mason, who is also the president of the AID.QUAKE.

Liz Taylor Blasts Bush AIDS Budget

WASHINGTON—Members of Congress fighting the AIDS epidemic were joined at a House budget hearing March 6 by politiicians, health care experts and AIDS advocates—including actress and fundraiser Elizabeth Taylor—in harshly criticizing AIDS funding levels in President George Bush's fiscal 1991 budget.

Testifying before the U.S. House Human Resources Task Force on the Budget, House members and AIDS activists alike criticized the Bush Administration's proposal for $1.69 billion in spending on AIDS programs in fiscal 1991 as being inadequate and short-sighted in light of the doubling AIDS caseloads nationwide.

"Over the past nine years, the country has gone through cycles of AIDS awareness: From ignorance to hysteria to complacency," stated Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.). "We have gone from a time when no one knew of AIDS to a time when everyone was terrified of it to a time when everyone knows about it and most people are seemingly unconcerned."

Taking harsh exception with the Bush funding levels, San Francisco Rep. Nancy Pelosi pointed out that, while the number of American AIDS cases is expected to swell to well over 200,000 in the next 12 months, and two successive national commissions on AIDS have called for massive increases in AIDS spending, the '91 Bush AIDS budget represents a real increase of only 2.4 percent over 1990 spending.

"This is the worst AIDS budget in at least five years," Pelosi stated empathically. "It not only sets an arbitrary spending limit that is unrealistic, it also goes to ideological extremes to eliminate programs that actually help people with AIDS. It would shift funding from effective programs to ones which do not work. I would suspend research to find a cure."

Pelosi produced Office of Management and Budget memoranda which showed how Darman's office only granted the National Institutes of Health 59 percent of what it requested for AIDS research, which she charged would threaten the future of AIDS vaccine and treatment research. Further memos showed how OMB now proposes to zero out funding for 63 federal and state AIDS prevention demonstration programs which, Pelosi stated, "are literally holding back a new wave of HIV infection."

Her harshest criticism, however, was held for the Bush budget's cuts in AIDS patient care funds, down from even current levels.

The Bush budget seeks to completely eliminate funds for home health services and AIDS drug reimbursement programs, approaches which have been viewed by AIDS activists and health care experts as critical in addressing the epidemic in the 90s. Also in the budget proposal, the White House seeks to zero fund a series of AIDS counseling, early intervention and AIDS sub-acute care and dental care programs.

Also testifying at the hearings, New York Mayor David Dinkins and Gay Men's Health Crisis Executive Director Taylor on p. 38.
Some gay leaders have called for a gay boycott of the census, arguing that the lack of education by the Census Bureau coupled with confidentiality concerns will lead to a gross undercount and a skewed statistical profile.

However, a recent poll by the Washington Blade, a gay newspaper, found that 75 percent of gay couples surveyed said they would record their relationship on the census form.

"Granted [the Blade survey was conducted in a major metropolitan area with a history of gay visibility," Young said. "Similar results may not emerge from some small town or hamlet. But then again, they might."

Name reporting nixed upstate

SYRACUSE, New York—Activists in upstate New York's Onondaga County have successfully stopped the passage of contact tracing legislation which could have been the first in a series of resolutions designed to overturn state laws which protect a person's right to an anonymous HIV test.

The resolution, as drafted by county legislators James Salinger and John Haley, called for the "New York State Legislature to amend the Public Health law to require every physician to report the positive results of HIV confidential testing to the Local Health Officer."

Local AIDS activists first heard about the resolution in the February 2, Syracuse Post-Standard, a local daily paper. They immediately began a campaign to clarify the content and implications of the proposed legislation and to bring awareness of it to the gay and lesbian community.

Michael Crinnin of the AIDS Task Force here called the legislation "ten steps backwards," adding, "People are so reluctant to get tested, but we were starting to move in the direction of testing and treatment. Perception was [that] it isn't safe to be tested, even though [the law] didn't touch anonymous testing. But perception is reality."

According to Salinger, who introduced the resolution, he agreed to table it because of political pressure, in part due to the activities of ACT UP/Syracuse which he calls part of a "nation-wide homosexual organization."

Salinger described the kind of discrimination PWAs and HIV positive people face as "probably a one and million type thing."

Brenda Baker, a spokesperson for ACT UP/Syracuse said, "If we hadn't been there [the resolution] would have been pushed through." Members of ACT UP, the local AIDS Task Force and the Gay and Lesbian Alliance of Syracuse met with County Health Commissioner Dr. James Miller and encouraged him to withdraw his support for the resolution. Dr. Miller said that the resolution was "indirectly seen as a precedent for state action" and that "the immediate results were overstated." But he later withdrew his support for it and has since stated, "We can accomplish more by working together."

Activists have drafted their own proposal which acknowledges the violence and discrimination faced by PWAs and HIV-positive people and states that absolute confidentiality "is the only proven and practical means of encouraging testing and the subsequent early treatment." Their resolution also calls for increased funding for AIDS education and services which have recently been cut.

Dogsledding for AIDS

ANCHORAGE-Sixty-five years ago, in the midst of a diphtheria epidemic, a group of dogsleds made its way across Alaska's frozen tundra on a mission to bring medicine to the stricken residents of Nome. This year, the dogsled expedition that commemorates that heroic trip, the Iditarod Trail Race, one musher will bear a reminder that a new scourge threatens the lives of Alaskans.

Diane Dronenberg, who has traversed the grueling 1,158-mile trail between Anchorage and Nome in three previous years’ races, will carry a panel from the Names Project Quilt in her sled. Through her dramatic journey, Dronenberg, whose brother has AIDS, hopes to awaken Alaska to the realization that AIDS threatens to ravage the state’s population. At least 49 people have died with AIDS in Alaska already, and 20 percent of the state’s HIV-positive people live in small towns in rural Alaska.

“Diana is carrying the panel to Nome out of love for her brother and to encourage a greater emphasis on AIDS education for Alaskan youth,” Dan Carter, a volunteer for the Names Project/Anchorage wrote in his announcement of the event. The Iditarod Trail Race began March 3 and is expected to last 12 to 15 days.

According to Carter, the local Names Project wanted to do something that would serve “to carry a banner for hope and compassion and to encourage personal involvement.” The state sport—dogsledding—seemed to present a perfect vehicle for their message, so Carter sat down and wrote letters to 15 mushers at random. When Dronenberg responded, disclosing that her brother had AIDS, Carter was thrilled.

On March 21, after the Iditarod’s conclusion, the Names Project/Anchorage will present Dronenberg and her brother, Dana, with letters and cards written in support of her mission. Although he has already received over 100 letters—with more pouring in each day as word of Dronenberg’s mission spreads—Carter is particularly proud that he will present her with a proclamation from the city of Fairbanks, which names Dronenberg the city’s official messenger of hope and compassion. “We hope that it will put a face to AIDS,” Carter concluded.

Letters of support for Dronenberg, and for her lead dog, Ruby, can be sent to Names Project c/o Dan Carter, P.O. Box 210072, Anchorage, Alaska 99521-0072.

Rally for Sgt. Ben-Shalom

MILWAUKEE—Sgt. Miriam Ben-Shalom officially wore her Army Reserves uniform for the last time March 6 and for the first time intentionally disobeyed an Army regulation and wore it to a political rally.

The rally was for her. About 40 friends and supporters gathered in front of the Federal Courthouse in Milwaukee in the one-degree wind chill on her behalf.

Ben-Shalom was discharged from the Army Reserves in 1976 for saying she was a lesbian. After long court battles, she eventually won the right to return to complete her term of enlistment in 1987.

But when her term ran out in 1988, the Army refused to allow her to re-enlist. She eventually brought her case to the U.S. Supreme Court, which on Feb. 26 refused without comment to hear her appeal.

Ben-Shalom took off her uniform as she spoke at the rally. She explained that the regulation banning homosexuals from the military could still be changed by Congress.

“Let’s go get Congress,” she said. “We’re going to make it a little hot for them.”

“Miriam did not lose,” said Bill Meunier, president of the Gay People’s Union of Wisconsin. “Miriam forced the Army to show its true bigotry.” Like some other speakers, Meunier said Ben-Shalom’s many years of work in the lesbian and gay movement had inspired him.

Ben-Shalom’s attorney, Patrick Bergan, who is straight, said he has found mainstream support for gay rights. “We’re simply not going to get redress in the courts. We’re going to get redress in the legislature,” he said.

J.J. Newmann, Mr. Gay Wisconsin, said “money talks” and said the government would notice if ten to 15 percent of the population refused to pay taxes to a government that discriminated against it.

Newmann, formerly a Marine sergeant, said he would be organizing a class action suit.

And Tim Grair, one of the organizers of the rally, said that as a boy he saw Ben-Shalom on the television news, and she was the first gay person besides himself he knew about.

“I always looked up to her,” Grair said. “In an age when there are few heroes, she’s my hero.” —Sue Burke

Anti-AIDS ads up at last

CHICAGO—AIDS activists, at last with help from the American Civil Liberties Union, have forced the Chicago Transit Authority to post educational AIDS materials in the transit system, even though the CTA called the advertisements “too Black-oriented.” More than a year and a half after they were produced, the ads were finally posted in the city’s buses and trains in late February.

“People have called to say that they’ve seen the ads and they don’t understand why there was ever a controversy about them,” said John Hammell, director of the ACLU’s AIDS and Civil Liberties Project. “They communicate a critical message which, hopefully, will save lives.”

The advertisements, which depict a naked couple with a condom and the international “no” symbol represented by a needle and syringe placed diagonally across a drawing of a person using drugs, are directed to the Black community. “Sex without condoms and drug abuse = AIDS. AIDS in the Black community is very real,” the ad’s legend says.

The advertisements were developed by the Kupona Network, Chicago’s only community-based organization devoted solely to providing education about AIDS to the Black community, with funds supplied by the Illinois Department of Public Health. The controversy began when the transit authority refused to post ads that one of its representatives had accepted. Between August 1989 and May 1989, Kupona officials wrote to and called the CTA in an attempt to resolve the dispute, but they received no response.

In September of last year, the ACLU filed suit against the CTA challenging the transit authority's refusal to sell advertising space to Kupona. Late last month, the ACLU announced that CTA had begun posting the Kupona posters.

"There was no good reason to refuse to post the ads," said Hammell. "It is an outrage that we had to file a lawsuit to get the ads up."

Hammell also said that the suit against the CTA will continue, to ensure that CTA regulations on advertising will be formally changed. Five years ago, one of the attorneys involved with the current case brought suit against the CTA for refusing to post other advertisements. In that case, the CTA's policies were found to be unconstitutional by both the federal district court in Chicago and the Federal Court of Appeals.

Public health officials estimate that Blacks account for over 30 percent of all new and reported AIDS cases in Chicago. —Nina Reyes

Lesbians take Manhattan

NEW YORK—Just over a month into the new decade, a group of lesbians are already making sure the L-word doesn't get left out of all the excitement of the "Gay 90s" by planning the first ever "Lesbian Week in New York City" from September 1-9. Planners see the event as an opportunity to celebrate the strengths and diversity of the lesbian community.

If you want a fighting chance, here's some good news:

New treatments are available to improve your chances of fighting AIDS. But the key to effective treatment is to start even before symptoms appear. That's why you should take a test to see if you have the HIV (AIDS) virus. For more information on testing, call your doctor or call us at 718-485-8111.

Week. Organizers say they think that the week has the potential of involving hundreds of thousands of participants.

The week was inspired by the mammoth lesbian week held in Berlin, West Germany. Robin Fetchko attended that in October and returned to the States with grand plans of her own. "I thought, "Why can't we do it here?"" she said, "And if we can do it in New York, why not everywhere else in the country?" Fetchko put the word out for lesbians interested in helping to organize and planning has taken off from there.

The site committee is scouting out choice spots in all five boroughs and lesbians as far away as Philadelphia have expressed interest in taking part in the week, according to Eva Yaa Asantewaa, an organizer who is recruiting area gay and lesbian organizations. She explained that mixed groups are encouraged to be involved provided all events are lesbian-focused. She also said it would be nice to see gay men involved with behind-the-scenes organizing for lesbian events.

"This is our party," Asantewaa said. "We're doing it for ourselves so we won't get lost in the shuffle." Asantewaa also sees the whole affair as an opportunity to build greater strength in the long-term for the lesbian community by building connections and coalitions which will continue beyond the week itself.

For more information, or to get involved with organizing Lesbian Week, contact Robin Fetchko at (718) 392-2519. Representatives from organizations should contact Eva Yaa Asantewaa at (718) 779-2010.

GLAAD hosts women's health day

NEW YORK—In celebration of Women's Health Day, the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation will sponsor an afternoon of special events, including its fourth annual lesbian Blood Drive, on March 25. GLAAD organizers present this opportunity for the lesbian community to help alleviate the critical shortage of blood supplies in the New York area.

"Raising blood in the middle of a health crisis is a responsible thing to do," commented Karin Schwartz, assistant director of GLAAD/New York. By expanding the event this year into Women's Health Day, GLAAD hopes to draw more attention to the event and to heighten interest in GLAAD. "It's a visibility tactic," Schwartz acknowledged.

Ironically, while the event, Schwartz said, is directed to the lesbian community, and while GLAAD representatives will present a workshop on lesbian invisibility, self-images and the media as part of the event, organizers elected to call the event "Women's Health Day" instead of a name that speaks more specifically to lesbians.

Schwartz said that she did not know how the name for the event was chosen.

Among the highlights of Women's Health Day will be a seminar on "Eroticizing Safer Sex," and demonstrations of self-defense techniques for women by the Brooklyn Women's Martial Arts. Participants will be eligible for a variety of "intriguing" door prizes, which in the past, according to Schwartz, have included "goodies from Eve's Garden," a women's sex emporium.

Last year, GLAAD's blood drive raised nearly 100 units of blood for the Greater New York Blood Program.

CHICAGO—A lesbian billboard created by the women's caucus of ACT UP/Chicago has made its first appearance in a working-class, Latino neighborhood on the city's near West side.

Affixed to a brick wall next to a liquor store, the billboard pictures 23 women hugging and kissing beneath the large purple words "COME OUT."

The billboard is part of the Randolph Street Gallery's "your message here" public art project and will be moved to other locations in the city in the next two months.

The sites are chosen by the Gannett Outdoor corporation, which is donating the space. So far, all of the "your message here" billboards have appeared in poor and working-class neighborhoods.

ACT UP project coordinator Mary Patten is not troubled about the placement, but says she would have translated "COME OUT" into Spanish had she known in advance of the billboard's present location.

ACT UP submitted some billboard proposals in Spanish, but they were not among the ideas selected for production.

Patten said the "COME OUT" message was conceived "because we wanted to do something addressing lesbian issues that was fun and kind of sexy and celebratory."

Two other ACT UP billboards are also included in the project. According to Patten, one reads "AIDS Doesn't Discriminate. We demand AIDS education, treatment and support, no matter what it takes." It includes portraits of gay men, a Black woman and a Latina woman and her baby, Patten said.

The third ACT UP billboard features silhouettes of primarily Black and Latino young people surrounded by the words "sex, condoms, racism, AIDS, safe sex, lesbian, gay, abortion and drugs."

At the bottom, the billboard reads: "Talk About It."

Patten said the "AIDS doesn't discriminate" billboard is presently trapped between two buildings and is almost invisible, but the youth-oriented billboard is facing a school building.

Among the ACT UP submissions that were not chosen for the project were lists of safe sex and safe drug-use practices.

"To be this massive, a project has to involve an advertising company," Patten said, "and that means certain things are going to get censored."

Fighting invisibility

NEW YORK—For the first time in 20 years, the gay pride parade may include an official people of color contingent, made up of both gay men and lesbians. Lesbians of color fought for the right to lead the women's contingent at the front of the parade, and have for many years. But a proposal that is being discussed in the gay and lesbian communities of New York may mean that lesbians of color may withdraw from that position.

The proposal that women of color leave the women's contingent to join the men of color at the center of the parade was discussed at a lesbian town meeting, Thursday, March 1, at the Gay and Lesbian Community Center. The People of Color Steering Committee, a body of Heritage of Pride, the group which organizes the annual parade, came up with the proposal in an effort to bring more "visibility to people of color in the gay community, respective communities and the political arena."

"The most invisible of the invisible in the homosexual community is the Black lesbian. When we used to march, we were overpowered. We had to form security lines to keep the men out of our space," said Candice Boyce, who was part of the original struggle to lead the lesbian contingent and is a member of African American Wimmin United for Societal Change.

But Michelle Bell who was also at the meeting said, "We won't be invisible. We're at a point in our history where we can't be separated. If we don't do this, we're not visible."

As stated in the proposal, the AIDS service section of the parade would also be lead by people of color organizations.

If consensus can be reached, and the proposal is accepted, it would only be for the 1990 parade. Any change would be reexamined before 1991.

Interested persons should fill out questionnaires that are now being distributed through Black and Latino organizations. The questionnaires can be returned at the Center. More discussion will take place at the next lesbian town meeting, 6:30, April 4, at the Center, 208 W. 13th St.

Colorado refuses anonymous testing option

DENVER—Three years after Colorado became the first state in the nation to require the reporting of names, the tracing of sexual contacts and the notification of the partners of people who test positive for HIV, a group of AIDS service providers began working to provide an anonymous testing option to citizens of the state. After only two months, however, the Colorado state legislature has refused to implement an anonymous testing option for at least the next two years.

"It doesn't look real promising," said Gary Sky, public affairs director for the Colorado AIDS Project, a community-based AIDS-service organization. The legislation was voted down both on the floor of the House and in a health-care committee on the Senate. "But even if it doesn't pass, it will be re-evaluated again in two years," he said.

Although 18 other states followed Colorado's example by implementing HIV testing policies that require name reporting and contact tracing or partner notification, Colorado is widely perceived to have the most ruthless, least efficient system. According to information obtained by the AIDS Quarterly, in one six-month period of 1988, the state spent $450,000 attempting to track down people who had been exposed to HIV, and managed to find only 52 of those individuals. The Colorado state health department disputes those figures.

Colorado has gone so far, in fact, in attempting to discover the identities of people who test positive for HIV, that even though the law does allow people to give a false name when undergoing a test, the state then attempts to find out the test recipient's name through other information given on the intake form. "If you give a false name in Colorado it's important that you give a false address and false telephone number as well," said Ann Shields, the Colorado AIDS Project's education director, "because we do know that the health department is cross-referencing the address to see if they can pick up the right name somehow."

Sky adds that while Colorado's health department so far has refused to release its list of people who have tested positive for HIV, "every single year it comes up that the police department wants those names, and insurance companies want those names."

Operating as the Colorado Task Force on Anonymous HIV Testing, 21 activists succeeded in convincing almost half of Colorado's legislators, according to Sky, that implementing an anonymous testing alternative would substantially increase the number of people who consider undergoing HIV testing. In Oregon, for example, Sky said, the number of gay and bisexual men rose 125 percent when the state introduced an anonymous-testing option.

Irish phone zap

Gay and Lesbian activists in Dublin are calling for phone zaps of Ireland’s embassy and consulates in the U.S. on Friday, March 16, the day before St. Patrick’s Day.

Callers should demand that the Irish parliament immediately overturn the nation’s sodomy law, in accord with an Oct. 1988 ruling of the European Court On Human Rights.

Activists won the court ruling after openly gay Senator David Norris pursued the case to the European Court, but Irish legislators continue to procrastinate in implementing the decision.

"Since over 40 million Americans have their roots in Ireland, public opinion in the U.S. can affect issues here," urged John Bergin, spokesman for the Gay and Lesbian Equality Network.

Ireland is one of the last European nations to criminalize gay and lesbian sex, and legislators have come under heavy pressure from right-wing Catholic groups to keep it that way.

opinion gives no consideration to the best interest of the child, which is usually considered the overriding factor in matters of child custody and visitation, and rejects the argument that last summer's Braschi decision, defining gay couples as "families" under rent control regulations, is relevant to this case.

Dissenting Justice Sybil Hart Kooper disagrees, arguing that Braschi required the court to take a deeper look at the reality of the situation. She asserted that the narrow definition of "parent" used by the majority is inconsistent "with the progressive and realistic definition of the term 'family' recently adopted by the Court of Appeals in Braschi."

And she protested that the court's formalistic approach would prevent any consideration of the best interest of the child, observing that "simplistic analysis and the strict application of absolute legal principles should be avoided... If the policy considerations presented in Braschi necessitated a re-examination of so traditional and sacrosanct a concept as the American family, then surely, the compelling circumstances presented a bar mandate, at the very least, a similarly enlightened construction of the term 'parent.'"

The opinion is expected to create a dilemma for lesbian couples who want to secure equal parental rights toward their children. The case attracted amicus briefs from the American Civil Liberties Union's Lesbian and Gay Rights Project, and a coalition of lesbian and gay parents groups.

Francisco Domingues, a member of HUGL and the Boricua Gay and Lesbian Forum, said "I was in charge of the mailing of the invitations for this meeting, and in my opinion there have been procedural breaches. LLEGO never told me that they were going to ask for nominations tonight. Personally I am interested in LLEGO and its work, but we have to take this one step at a time."

But Arcadio Torres, LLEGO's treasurer, while acknowledging the need of local organizations to decide what kind of participation they want to have in LLEGO, also pointed out that this was the third meeting LLEGO has had with the New York groups.

According to Torres, the organization currently has over 200 members in the U.S., seven of which are organizational members. A contribution fee is charged to members and is higher for organizations. While individual members are able to vote at LLEGO's meetings, organizations are not, a fact that troubled Luis Nieves, a member of the steering committee of the Boricua Gay and Lesbian Forum.

"We cannot become members as an organization because then we will not have a vote. I am encouraging the idea of individual membership in order to have more votes," he said. LLEGO is still in its infancy and it can be crucial for us to have an impact in its development. As I see it, it is a predominantly Chicano(a) organization that is why I feel that the impact of groups from other nations is important."

LLEGO's Gómez explained that LLEGO wants to be accessible to its members "What we hope is that you don't have to go through a chain, just call us," she said. "We want the board to be representative. You live here, you know what is going on. I don't know what the issues are in New York. Just pick up the phone and call us."

LLEGO has been representing the Latino(a) lesbian and gay community in national conferences, such as the National Council La Raza, the National Minority AIDS Conference, the Hispanic/Latino AIDS Teleconference, the National AIDS Update Conference and the National Hispanic Bar Association. "I've been to New York before, so I know the politics," said Dennis Medina, interim board member for the Eastern region. "To me it is a little frustrating, but it is a process we have to go through. We understand that New York has to work out its issues and then come to us."

LLEGO's national office is located at 714 G Street, SE, Washington, DC 20003. The telephone number there is (202)544-0992.

universities. Last year, the program awarded 1,500 four-year scholarships, which include a tax-free $100-per-month subsistence allowance.

Upon completion of the program, officers must serve either four years active duty or eight years in the reserves.

The DOD's anti-gay policy, in part, reads: "The presence in the military environment of persons who engage in homosexual conduct or who, by their statements, demonstrate a propensity to engage in homosexual conduct,... adversely affects the ability of the Armed Forces to maintain discipline, good order and morale; to foster mutual trust and confidence among servicemembers; to ensure the integrity of the system of rank and command; to facilitate assignment and worldwide deployment of servicemembers who frequently must live and work under close conditions affording minimal privacy; to recruit and retain members of the Armed Forces; to maintain the public acceptability of military service; and to prevent breaches of security." ▼ corrupt places on the face of this earth," adding that "there is the stench of corruption about this place."

Calling the Armstrong rider an "ugly amendment," Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) countered that "Hitler began his persecution and genocide policies by attacking homosexuals. He made them wear a pink star so that no young person could mistake a gay German for a role model," Cranston said, "Next, he went to yellow stars for Jews, and the Holocaust followed."

Although gay and lesbian activists suspect that Armstrong will try to impose his amendment again on the D.C. appropriations bill this summer, they note that, as he did in this case, he could bring it up at virtually any time.

Robert Bray, a spokesman for the NGLTF, said, "I think we need to watch the senator every single time he goes on that floor." ▼

In Our Own Hands

All About Breasts

In Our Own Hands is a monthly column about women's health.

by Risa Denenberg

And of course cancer is political—look at how many of our comrades have died of it during the last ten years. As warriors our job is to actively and consciously resist it for as long as possible, remembering that in order to win, the aggressor must conquer, but the resisters need only survive.

—Audre Lorde, A Burst of Light, 1988

If you have cancer, you wait endlessly for a support group, which if you are a lesbian, woman of color, working class or believe in alternatives, you don’t fit into anyway... No organization fights for your needs, no one advocates for you.

—Jackie Minnow, from “Lesbians Working on AIDS,” Outlook, Summer 1989

One in 11 women in the U.S. will be diagnosed with breast cancer in her lifetime. That adds up to about 120,000 new cases each year and bears a death toll of nearly 42,000 women annually. Mortality rates have changed very little in the past 30 years, although early detection tends to yield better outcomes. White women are more likely to get breast cancer, but Black women have poorer survival rates. The first statistic may be related to genetics or diet (high meat consumption correlates to higher risk of breast cancer); the second fact is obviously political (racism = bad health care). Ninety percent of all cancers are related to environmental factors.

Women’s breasts are complex organs containing glands, skin, fat, muscle, ducts and fibrous supporting structures. Breasts go through monthly cycles in women who menstruate, and are sensitive to changing levels of circulating female hormones such as estrogen, progesterone and prolactin. Each month the breast prepares for lactation, and sheds its monthly buildup when pregnancy does not occur. Often the cyclic accumulation of fluid and dead cells results in thickenings or lumps in the breasts. Most breast lumps are not cancer, and most women have textured (lumpy) breasts.

Eighty percent of lumps are benign (non-cancerous); either cystic or fibrous. Cysts are fluid-filled sacs, and fibrous masses are more solid thickenings. Combinations of the two types also occur. Fibrocystic disease, which is very common in menstruating women, results in hard, lumpy breasts which engorge and are painful especially premenstrually. Firmer, less painful benign lumps are usually fibrous masses called fibroadenomas.

Fibrocystic disease improves in some women who decrease caffeine intake (coffee, tea, cola, chocolate and some medicines) and who add a daily Vitamin E capsule to their diet.

Perhaps the worst part of having benign breast lumps is the role they play in inhibiting women from trusting our own hands to find the lump that is not OK. One approach to this common concern is to remember that you will always know your breasts better than your health provider; 90 percent of breast tumors are found by women during self exam or by partners during sex.

Women should begin breast self exams starting at least by age 20, because at least 20 percent of breast cancer occurs in women under 40. Younger women often have rapid acceleration of their cancers. And the longer you practice, the more confident you become. The earlier a lump is found, and cancer diagnosed, the less likely that a woman will lose her breast or her life.

Who’s at Risk?

Predicting who may develop breast cancer by identifying high risk groups can be misleading. The high rate of breast cancer in women in the U.S. should put all women on alert. Rates are simply higher in some groups.

High risk characteristics include age (over 50); early onset of periods (under 12) or late menopause (after 55); family history (mother, sister, grandmother); previous breast cancer; delayed childbearing (after 30) or no childbearing. Research is inconclusive on whether having benign breast disease is itself a risk factor for breast malignancies.

Levels of female hormones, especially estrogen, is closely related to breast disease. High doses of synthetic estrogens, and meat produced by hormone-fed animals both add estrogen. There is a strong association between high dietary consumption of animal fat and breast cancer. The hormone levels in a woman’s body can also be affected by body weight and the total years of menstruation (which is why full-term pregnancies, late period onset and early menopause may decrease the overall breast exposure to the body’s estrogen production). Other toxic substances (such as pesticides used in food production) may also be stored in breasts, which contain much fatty tissue.

Early Detection

Screening for breast cancer includes monthly self exams, annual breast exams by a health provider and the use of mammography (breast pictures using low dose x-rays). The American Cancer Society presently recommends a baseline mammogram for all women between ages 35 and 40, biannual mammos from ages 40-50 and annually after 50. Mammography, however, is expensive and not always covered by Medicaid/Medicare/insurance. And while mammography is useful diagnostically when a lump is found, it is not conclusive in itself. Any suspicious lump should be biopsied, or aspirated with a needle. This procedure should always be done as a diagnostic workup by a health care professional, preferably under a local anesthesia, with a time interval between it and initiation of surgical treatment. If a biopsy is positive for cancer cells, the stage of cancer must be determined; localized (breast only), regional (in the nearby lymph nodes) or metastasized (spread to other distant body organs).

Early detection provides an increased likelihood of less extensive surgery, and an improved survival opportunity. It offers adequate time for seeking second opinions and making personal decisions about treatment. Mastectomies are often unnecessary, and less radical lumpectomies followed by radiation therapy are now considered to be a preferable procedure most of the time. The type of tumor found, the stage of cancer, the woman's age and health history are all part of the decision about use of chemotherapy. Younger, menstruating women are often targeted for chemo, while postmenopausal women without evidence of metastasis often do not need it.

Preventing Breast Cancer

Many of us will get breast cancer because environmental and social realities will not change quickly enough to prevent it. Still, many sources exist which suggest preventive measures that may play a role in reducing our risk. In initiating a change in diet or exercise or starting new supplements to your diet, take time to read, learn and discuss the changes you are making.

Reducing fat, especially from animal sources, is important. Large sugar intake often accompanies nutritional deficiencies and should be avoided. Excessive protein from animal sources (especially beef and pork) is almost always accompanied by excess fat intake. Other substances that correlate with breast disease include caffeine and alcohol. Alcohol has been shown to correlate to increased risk of breast cancer in recent studies, even in moderate amounts.

Many sources recommend regular exercise in cancer prevention. This helps by decreasing overall body fat, improving blood and lymph circulation and enhancing general well-being.

Some Musings on Breasts

The first time I saw a woman who'd had a mastectomy, I was outdoors with a group of dykes on several private acres of land, planting a garden. She took her shirt off like the rest of us, hauling sheep manure from the truck into the compost heap. Two thickened, healed scars curved and nearly touched across her breastless chest. I thought she was beautiful. But then I've always liked flat-chested women.

I was eight when my aunt died in her 50s of breast cancer. Her death was shrouded in secrecy, as cancer deaths often were in the 50s.

When I first read Audre Lorde's The Cancer Journals I cried and wondered at her power and her strength. And then I gave a copy of it to my mother, three years ago, before her breast surgery, as she was grappling with her own difficult decisions.

Then there's my breasts. How I covered them with multi-layers of clothes and sweaters when they first sprouted, a bit earlier than my girlfriends, making me feel like baby fat. I loved them when they produced the milk that I nursed my son with for two years. I liked the money I made topless go-go dancing in the early 70s. Now, I hardly notice my breasts. They are not my focus of sexual pleasure. I wear t-shirts, rather than bras. I hate the way sweat gathers under them in the summer, and the pain they cause me before my periods. I don't examine them as often as I tell other women they should. But I don't want to lose them. And I don't want them to betray me.

clerk Duane Rinde applied last December for a spouse discount card for his lover, Robert Teir, the company refused his request and began a confrontation with local gay and lesbian activists. The card, previously given only to married heterosexual couples, grants discounts to spouses on purchases at any of the store’s outlets.

Rinde, says Au Courant, filed a union grievance against the store and charged that Woodies violated D.C. and Montgomery County, Maryland anti-discrimination laws. The National Gay and Lesbian Task Force and other gay rights groups immediately called for a meeting with store executives and launched a campaign to pressure the store to change its discriminatory policies. Ultimately, in addition to granting Rinde’s lover a discount card, Woodies agreed to immediately implement gay and lesbian sensitivity training at the store where the incident occurred and training for management and staff at all stores on discrimination and bias on the basis of race, sex and sexual orientation. Since Woodward and Lothrop owns the John Wannamaker stores in the Philadelphia area, the change in policy will affect those stores as well.

If you would like to applaud Woodie’s for its enlightened new personnel policy, write to Arno Arronson, CEO, Woodward and Lothrop, 11th and F Streets NW, Washington, D.C. 20013, or call him at (202) 347-5300.

Recently at WZOU-FM in Boston, an announcer used her early evening show to make fun of gay people. Karen Blake staged a skit with a man affecting the voice of an effeminate-sounding, lisping, ostensibly gay caller asking her to pass on a “Valentine wish for his lover,” who, he said, was named Bob. Ms. Blake feigned surprise at his request and when the man asked if Ms. Blake could “do something else for his lover,” her punch line was “I’m sorry, you’ll have to call the bondage line for that.” It’s deplorable that Ms. Blake and her cohort saw fit to portray a gay caller as a simpering freak. Would they likewise have set up a portrayal of a stereotypical Black or Jewish person? Surely not, but, as usual, gays are considered fair game. If you would like to protest this skit, write to Karen Blake or to Alan Shartrand, General Manager, WZOU-FM, 313 Congress Street, Boston, MA 02210. Or give them a call at (617) 267-9090.

The University of California at Irvine has just made a policy change which defames gay relationships by saying, in effect, that they are not to be taken as seriously as marriages between straight people.

After a year and a half of allowing lesbian and gay couples to live in married-student housing at the university, even if only one partner was attending the school, officials now require that both partners be students. For married students, however, only one partner must be a student to qualify for housing.

The university claims that it has not banned gays from family housing—only non-students. “We don’t ask students, ‘Are you gay? We only ask them, are they students?” says the director of public information. Yeah, sure, but you don’t ask the spouses of married students if they’re students.

If you would like to make your opinion known about this obviously discriminatory treatment of gay people, write to Chancellor Jack Peltason, Room 501, Administration Building, University of California, Irvine, CA 92717, or call him at (714) 856-5111.

Woodward and Lothrop, the trend-setting Washington D.C. department store (Washingtonians talk about “Woodies” with the same affection that New Yorkers’ reserve for “Bloomies”) has agreed to grant discount cards to partners of both gay and non-gay employees, add “sexual orientation” and “marital status” to its equal opportunity policy and to advocate for similar benefits elsewhere in the retail industry. As reported in the Philadelphia gay newspaper, Au Courant, when sales Hold On To Your Health Insurance!

If You Have Just Left Your Job or Are Thinking About Leaving Your Job
Read On

You may already know about the COBRA law that allows people to keep their health insurance after leaving their job. But you should be aware of two important changes in the law that affect employees with chronic disabilities, including AIDS.

1. If you were disabled when you left your job, you may now be able to keep your present group health insurance for 29 months (long enough to qualify for Medicare).

2. If you switch jobs, you may now be able to keep your old coverage until the waiting period for pre-existing conditions on your new insurance has passed.

If you are leaving your job for any other reason, you may be able to keep your old coverage for up to 18 months.

A Call to Riot

With this article I am calling for a MASSIVE DISRUPTION of the Sixth International AIDS Conference that is being held in San Francisco June 20-24.

Every human being who wants to end the AIDS epidemic must be in San Francisco from June 20-24, at the Sixth International Conference on AIDS, either inside or outside the Moscone Convention Center, or the Marriott Hotel, screaming, yelling, furiously angry, protesting, at this stupid conference.

These are the facts:

1. A cure for AIDS is available much more rapidly than we are getting it. Treatments are available that we cannot get. Vital research simply isn't being done.
2. We are not getting any of this because of bureaucracy, red tape and a president who, to put it mildly, doesn't give a shit. George Bush has even refused to speak at the opening of this conference.
3. The government's ACTG system for delivering promising treatments to those who desperately need them (which is administered by the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, part of the National Institutes of Health), is a sham, a shocking, sinful sewer of ineptitude, run by idiots, nincompoops, quack doctors who should have their licenses revoked.

New research is on hold while they take a year off to sort out their fucked-up computer data base. Their research has not been adequately available to minorities, women or children. Thousands of ACTG treatment slots are empty. Can you believe that there are thousands of vacancies for people to receive free drugs, and this asshole government and this asshole ACTG system doesn't fill them up? How fucking inefficient, and SAVAGELY INHUMANE, can a system be?

What new treatments has the ACTG system come up with in the four years of its dreary existence? NONE. NOTHING. NIENTE. NADA. Every drug that is presently available for AIDS has come from some source other than the ACTG system—a foreign country, a pharmaceutical company, independent research. You'd think such failure would make the ACTG less powerful. No way. To make certain we are exterminated a little faster, the ACTG has control over what new drugs are studied (or rather, not studied) and what research is funded (or rather, not funded). Thus, our lives are totally in its hands and its hands are killing us as sure as if they stuck actual daggers into our hearts.

4. The same Doctor Strangeloves who control the ACTG system are the same Doctor Strangeloves who are controlling the agenda of, and shutting out any dissident voices from, the Sixth International Conference on AIDS.
5. These are also the very same doctors who are trying to screw us out of Parallel Track. (They don't like Parallel Track because they don't have control of it.) This historic and revolutionary method for getting more drugs into more bodies with more speed was conceived, fought for, orchestrated and obtained by ACT UP. All you PWAs and HIV-positives: those promising experimental drugs you can't afford to buy overseas or on the underground and you thought were waiting for us on Parallel Track? They just got snatched away. Just when we were about to get ddC and GM-CSF to follow ddI. Do you want them back? Then you fucking well better show up in San Francisco June 20-24!

6. TONS OF BASIC SCIENCE HASN'T EVEN BEEN DONE YET! Can you believe that? I repeat: MASSIVE AMOUNTS OF RESEARCH STILL HAS NOT EVEN COMMENCED. NIH doctors know this! They know what should be researched and still it is not being researched! THEY KNOW IT! Can you believe such tactics, such an attitude?

And people think we are being paranoid when we scream GENOCIDE!

7. The excuse they use is that GOVERNMENT RESEARCH IS INVESTIGA-TOR-INITIATED, NOT GOAL-ORIENTED. In other words, any stupid asshole can submit a grant proposal for funding, even if every lab in the world is already studying the same stupid thing. God forbid Drs. Tony Fauci or Sam Broder or Paul Volberding or Margaret Fischl or Thomas Merrigan or Dan Hoth or Larry Corey or Martin Hirsch (some of these people are not your friends, no matter how nice you think they are) should then go out and LOCATE an investigator and hire him/her to research the question like you hire an actor to play a part. This stupid attitude could very well be the death of us. The research might never be done! HOW MANY YEARS DO YOU HAVE TO PISS AWAY WAITING?

8. This conference is going to be about as “International” as the Ku Klux Klan. Uncle George’s government now forbids anyone who has AIDS or is HIV-positive to enter his wonderful country. Uncle George is punishing us for having the naughty HIV virus in our system. Any foreigner who has AIDS or is HIV-positive and wants to come to the “International” AIDS Conference is forbidden entry past our statue of “Liberty.”

Thus, every foreigner with an ounce of humanity is staying home to protest this inhumanity.

Yes, huge numbers of foreign scientists, plus international AIDS and gay organizations, as well as many American ones too, are all boycotting the Sixth “International” AIDS Conference.

In other words, THE SIXTH “INTERNATIONAL” AIDS CONFERENCE WILL BE A SICK JOKE.

Most of those there will be—like scabby strike-busters—the slick, heartless Washington bureaucratic representatives of Uncle George, and the expense-account rich hucksters from the greedy profiteering drug companies that suck our blood and the thousands of representatives of an international media that still can’t report AIDS with any accuracy or genuine understanding.

9. We are being royally fucked over, screwed to death, whatever you want to call being INTENTIONALLY ALLOWED TO DIE. This is no longer hyperbole, exaggeration, opinion—it is fact. The systems this government has in operation simply could not move any more slowly.

HOW MANY TIMES DO YOU HAVE TO HEAR THIS BEFORE YOU

remark in The Advocate, a gay magazine.

Rooney's homophobia was never in doubt throughout the highly publicized brouhaha. In the past six months, he has slandered gays repeatedly in remarks made on 60 Minutes, in his syndicated newspaper column and in a letter to The Advocate.

Those remarks did not get him in much trouble, however, until they were combined with the alleged racist comments.

Among the activists dissatisfied with Rooney's 60 Minutes apology are staffers at New York's Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation.

"The whole tone of the discussion was that the charge of racism against him was something to be taken very seriously and the charge of homophobia against him was much less important," said Executive Director Craig Davidson. "But at least he acknowledged that what he has said was unjust and harmed gay people, and he seems sincere about not wanting to hurt us in the future."

Robert Bray, spokesman for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, was less generous.

"The two phrases that were missing from his so-called apology were 'I'm sorry' and 'I apologize,'" Bray said. "We are still waiting for his apology to the 24 million gays and lesbians in this country."

He apparently doesn't think that gays and lesbians are the victims of discrimination and hatred and defamation whereas obviously he knows that Blacks are." ▼

Director Tim Sweeney likewise decried the Bush AIDS budget, citing the overburdened status of New York City hospitals and the lack of access to treatment on the part of poor and minority HIV and AIDS patients.

"The New York Times was not exaggerating when it said New York is in danger of becoming the new Calcutta," said Sweeney.

Drawing the most attention to the hearings, however, was the appearance of American Foundation for AIDS Research national chairperson Elizabeth Taylor at the hearing.

Outlining a bleak future on the AIDS front, Taylor denounced the mindset that would have it that AIDS is now getting too much of the "pie" of health care dollars.

"That simply is not true," said Taylor. "The hard, cold facts tell a very different story." Taylor later added that while today some people are more comfortable talking about AIDS in children, many are still unwilling to address the issue of gay men with AIDS. ▼

today," she said, "a place to live, the right to have a job, to live our lives without unreasonable barriers and to have access to decent medical care. We are not asking for extras."

Kennedy and Hatch were joined at the event by New York Mayor David Dinkins and Sen. Alphonse D'Amato (R-NY).

Underscoring the New York City crisis, Mayor Dinkins voiced his support of the bill, saying that it would make the difference between AIDS patients "dying with dignity" and "dying in rags and rage."

"There are those who would have us believe that this health crisis is no crisis at all," said Taylor, "that the number of AIDS cases is leveling off, that heterosexuals are not at risk and that AIDS has been overfunded."

"Well, those people are wrong," she added. "Dead wrong." ▼

The Other Side of Malcolm

He was the epitome of the fabled American Dream. The guy with the bucks, the brains and the beautiful movie actress by his side. But like so many in the upper echelons of glamour, glitter and glory, Malcolm Forbes was living a senseless lie.

by Michelangelo Signorile

A short, plump woman dressed in black feverishly gave programs to reporters and photographers outside the church. As the flashbulbs popped and the TV cameras rolled, Le Cirque owner Sirio Macioni played doorman in front of St. Bart's on Park Avenue, pointing to those whom the 50 aggressive police officers should clear a path for.

"Oh yes, that's Claudia Cohen...Yes, yes, that's Diane Von Furstenburg. Let her in!"

The next day, The New York Times—which had previously published an obituary implying that Malcolm Forbes was romantically involved with Elizabeth Taylor and said he had once planned to marry her, only to mysteriously strike the reference in the paper's later editions—had this to say about the event: "Some worldly mourners said they had never seen such a splendid mix of people—not even at another somewhat heterogeneous gathering, Truman Capote's fabled Black and White Ball at the Plaza Hotel two decades ago."

It was a splashy memorial service indeed. Lots of pretty boys, Hollywood agents, publishing magnates and celebrity beards, as well as Richard Nixon and quite a few other staunch conservatives. But did the homophobes know that they were coming to pay homage to someone who embodied what they ultimately detested? Did notoriously anti-gay Bill Buckley, who only a week before wrote a syndicated Daily News column headlined "Forbes—A Man Larger Than Life Itself," know that he was laying praise upon a "sex driven gay" whose ass he might have wanted to tattoo? Did USA Today founder Al Neuharth, who a few months ago made anti-gay remarks about male flight attendants, know that his dear friend "Chairman Malcolm" was one of those dreaded perverts? Did Newsday's Dennis Duggan—who still refuses to believe Father Ritter toyed with boys—know what his "Peter Pan with dough" did with his capitalist tool? Did Forbes's own son Steve, who now takes over the empire and whom The Wall Street Journal describes as an "ideological, conservative Republican," have any idea that his own greenback-conscious dad was as queer as a three-dollar-bill?

Dan [not his real name] worked for two years as a waiter at the Forbes townhouse and galleries which adjoin the Forbes offices on lower Fifth Avenue.

"It's the homoerotic art that hit me when I first got there," he recalls. "There's this one painting on the wall called 'Sailors and Floozies', in which all the floozies look like drag queens. Then there's this one called 'Manhole'—it's the top view of a manhole with construction workers toiling inside."

Dan had great respect for Forbes. He says he was always treated exceptionally well. Although he never engaged in sexual activities with Forbes, he watched the comings and goings of many men.

"He really went after the waiters. I mean he did it a lot—as much as he possibly could. If he liked them he'd ask them to show up the next time early—at the townhouse. He'd ask them to go in the jacuzzi with him. Then, of course, they'd have sex. He'd give them a 100-dollar bill when he finished—they used to love to talk about it. They got the money even if they refused the sex."

Troy, Hal, Andy and Mitch [not their real names], all waiters, each separately described the same scenario. In each case Forbes would ask the young man to come up to the house. He'd ask him into the jacuzzi. Forbes would then begin to stroke the man's legs slowly. He'd then proceed to masturbate him before going on to perform oral sex on the young man, if indeed the man desired it (not all of the four had let him). After the sexual encounter ended, Forbes would hand the man a 100-dollar bill.

"He never forced anyone," says Dan. "One friend of mine was actually straight, believe it or not, but he figured, "what the hell? He's a millionaire.' But then after he got in the tub and Malcolm started touching him, he got uneasy. Malcolm said, 'Am I bothering you?' and he said, 'yes' and they just stopped. He still gave him a hundred-dollar bill.

"Of course, if you were lazy you had to put out, otherwise you were gonna get fired or you had to start working harder."

Actually, some of the people present at the memorial service bad to have known that Malcolm Forbes was gay, no matter what they may actually say. They, after all, were privy to the same information that the rest of us were. But their hypocrisy is easily rationalized.

Malcolm Forbes was a rich and powerful man and if he wanted to be secretly queer, well, then, none of them would be the first to stop him. Besides, that was all his business and he kept "quiet" about it, a highly praised quality in wealthy and ultra-conservative circles. Bill Buckley, for instance, probably finds it highly commendable that certain individuals who float about in the same social arena as he and his wife Pat remain "discrete" about their sexual orientation.

It becomes increasingly clear that while the thought of our big, macho, American publishing tycoon being a homo comes as a shock to many, lots of others knew for a long time of Forbes' secret gay life and simply excused his being a fag. Others, no doubt, were in denial, sloughing off any rumors or stories they'd heard.

Georg Osterman is playwright-in-residence at The Ridiculous Theatrical Company, the company made famous by the late Charles Ludlam and now being carried on by Ludlam's long-time companion, Everett Quinton. Osterman has received quite a bit of publicity for his current adaptation of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde for Quinton at the Ridiculous.

But before becoming a near-well-known playwright, Osterman worked as a communications manager at Forbes. That was in 1982.
Working in the Capitalist Closet

by Al Weisel

BALI, Indonesia—When I heard that Malcolm Forbes had died, I was watching an emu stroll gracefully across a cattle ranch in the outback of Queensland, Australia, a place where homosexuality is illegal and a national gay magazine has to issue a special edition with precensored pages. It had been only a few months since I had quit working as a proofreader at Forbes magazine and, as a parting gesture after my four-year stint, told Malcolm he should come out of the closet. Now here I was among the lonesome cowboys, getting sketchy news of home over the telephone, miles away from New York, a city that is so progressive for gays, yet where one of its most prominent gay citizens dies in the closet.

While Forbes' life was nothing but a press release, it wasn't only the public at large on which he was trying to fob off his myth. He seemed to be trying to convince himself that he was the image that he had created. And this image was by no means—horror of horrors!—gay. Last year contractors were refurbishing Forbes' bathroom, sauna and infamous Jacuzzi. (He often invited young men he encountered around the offices to dinner, suggesting that first they take a Jacuzzi together. Always before dinner.) They were located in his townhouse adjoining the offices by way of a secret door out in the brick, the purpose of which, no doubt, was to make a quick getaway if rough trade proved too rough. While work was going on we were able to get a look at how the other one percent lives. Naturally, there were the usual gold faucets shaped like swans. But what was most interesting was how in this private sanctum he still seemed to feel the need to convince himself of his legend. Even here were pictures of his balloons and his yacht. You could imagine him sitting on the toilet saying to himself over and over again, "I own that. I own that..." There were also several Victorian paintings of naked women—"look, I'm straight!"—though there was a picture of his college wrestling team, for masturbation purposes, I suppose.

The most cynical of Forbes' attempts

"I was personally involved with Malcolm," he says flatly. "I was impressed with him. He worked that business into something amazing. And his art collection was bizarrely eclectic. But to be honest, I thought he was very self-centered. The times I spent with him, he'd spend 15 minutes or so asking 'how are you?' then from there on in it was 'me, me, me, me, me, me...'

"How it starts is—it's the same with everyone; he's done it with others in the office—he notices you working there and he starts to follow you around.

"I'm delivering something and there's Malcolm following me, and asking, 'How are you today?' and I answer, 'I'm in a hurry, Mr. Forbes.'

"I'd heard from other people that he tries things. My friend who worked in the art department had a bad experience. Malcolm was very persistent. Things became very difficult for him when he didn't want to do it.

"He invited me to the townhouse for drinks. I went to the townhouse. I think he thought it would be some idiot who would just pop into the sack with him right away. We talked a while. There were all these beautiful paintings all around. It was beautiful. There was a lot of work, and I knew all of these painters. He just sort of sat there and stared at me. I don't know if he was impressed or appalled.

"We then watched a Colt gay porn video, and got around to the business after that—and after some of the best strawberry daquiris I've ever had!

"It continued a few times after that. To a degree, he was very charming. I did it for the experience. I mean, I was having sex with a millionaire. It was an experience. It was fine.

"Osterman says that, though Forbes' marriage to the former Roberta Remsen Laidlaw ended in divorce in 1985, the two had been living separate lives for years. The marriage was, in his opinion, for cosmetic purposes and for the sake of creating heirs.

"They only got together during the holidays to take pictures and such and they hadn't had sex in ages," he claims.

Throughout the marriage, it seems, Forbes never stopped engaging in homosexual activities, which as the years went on would become his predominant, if not exclusive, form of sex. Trapped within the confines of family and big, big business, Forbes found himself trying to fit gay sex into his daily routine—trying to incorporate it somehow into his life. For him, that meant hiring men as chauffeurs, waiters, captains and house boys with whom he could have sex on a daily basis. It meant putting some of his staff in charge of scouring the town to find hired help that would also potentially put out. It meant propositioning people on staff he might not know were gay or who he did not originally seek out for strictly sexual purposes. Sometimes these people were writers and other employees of his magazines. And many times the sex took place inside his office at Forbes. It meant engaging in practices which many have described as exploitative, coercive and tantamount to on-the-job sexual abuse. Many times it meant—or even most times—paying for the sex, carrying around a stack of $100 bills and slipping one to each employee after the sexual encounter took place. It meant also passing a bill to those men who were insulted, outraged or just plain said "no" so that they would keep their mouths shut.

"If you were a waiter, or anybody, and he liked you, he might ask you to be his chauffeur," says Dan. Ernest [not his real name], who briefly worked at the townhouse, confirms this. He was at one point asked to be a chauffeur, but refused. As the men point out, Forbes would have easier access to the chauffeur and a better chance of having regular sex with him since they could do it in the car. It was considered a "special" position.

Peter [not his real name] had arrived in New York from a European country a few years ago.

"A friend had set me up on a date with a rich man the week I arrived in the U.S.,” he recalls. "He said his name was Malcolm Forbes. I had never heard of him. I asked another friend if I should go. He said, 'Of course, are you crazy?!!'

"[Forbes] picked me up on his motorcycle. We went to dinner and then to a nightclub. And then we spent some time together later."

The two saw some more of each other in the next two weeks. Peter is extremely coy when it comes to talking about sex and about discussing just what they did "later," but does not deny that they had a physical relationship.

Within weeks of first meeting Forbes, Peter left New York for Los Angeles to become "an actor." But he was back within a year.

"I went back to Forbes and became a chauffeur for him," he says. "I was driving around people like Elizabeth Taylor. It was very exciting. And I spent a lot of time with him. Sometimes we’d go out on the motorcycle. I liked him a lot. He was a great person."

Evelyn [not her real name] remembered hearing all of the rumors at the magazine about certain young men in the office having flings with Forbes.

"Half the people in the office were totally blind to what was going on. If you told them, they would never believe it," she says. "I mean, I think they’d think you were crazy if you told them. The other half, well, I think they just sort of knew everything that was going on and talked about it a lot. I certainly knew that some of the guys were fooling around with him."

Victor [not his real name] had had encounters with Forbes in the editors' offices at the magazine.

"I remember when he’d call me up to the office. Everyone would be impressed, thinking it was business. I mean these people were so stupid. They really didn’t know what was going on.

"Those closet doors are six-foot lead. This is before the renovation. His office was on the end. Just 30 feet from his desk was where his son Steve was sitting.

"The door would always be wide open. And the secretary would be sitting there. There was no way she could see in though. And she would never just come in. She’d always call first.

"Anyway, he’d just start going down on me. I would get so nervous. And every now and then he’d pull his head up and ask me some sort of business question so that they would hear us talking outside the office. Then he’d go back down on me and I’d be answering the question. He did this—leaving the door open—because it was safer. No one would think anything. He was very careful. He wouldn’t shut the door because he didn’t want it to look weird. And, also, I really think he liked the intrigue and excitement.

"When it was over, he’d slip me 100 bucks."

While many of those who knew Forbes spoke highly of him, others were much more critical. Some employees felt seriously coerced and even abused.

Richard [not his real name] was one of quite a few men who worked for Forbes as 'cater waiters and felt angry about things that went on.

"When you start working there the other waiters tell you what to expect," he explains. "They tell you that he asks you to strip and to go in the hot tub. Or to escort him to dinner as his 'bodyguard.' It’s not that he hid that. He was always on his motorcycle with hot boys. Everyone knew. It’s surprising that nobody mentioned that—people like Liz Smith—but they didn’t.

"One night I went into work and the captain said, 'the old man wants to see you.' So I went up to his office. He said, 'I admire the work that you’re doing.' He asked me to come up to the townhouse after the cocktail party and see some pictures from Tangiers. I said to myself, ‘well, why not? I was curious. I wanted to see the pictures.

"It was ten o'clock and I was up there. He made me a drink. Then we were sitting there and he put his hand on my knee and said, 'You don't mind an old man liking you, do you?' He was rubbing his hands up and down my thighs. I said, 'I gotta go.' He gave me a copy of this book—some hot air balloon book, one of those self-indulgent books he wrote. He said, 'I don't give this book out to many people.' In the elevator, he slipped something in my pocket and said, 'Keep this between you and me.' And then he said to give his secretary a call if I wanted to go to dinner and rate restaurants with him. 'We'll go to dinner and you can be my bodyguard,' he said.

'I got outside and found a hundred dollar bill in my pocket and thought, 'This is hush money. Fucker this!'

'm general I think he was really a very nice man. I don't fault him at all for trying to pick up boys. He really meant well. He certainly was not as bad as a lot of other rich people. However, I have a lot of trouble with people who have money and have to put on this major charade. When you have so much money who gives a shit? He was trying always to worry about his image in Peoria.

"What did bother me was his saying, 'This is between us.' I find that offensive.

"He's exploitative. He thinks he could just give some boys money and they'll do what he wants. It's not good. I don't think anyone should need to feel pressured to do it. I think some people thought, 'hey, I might be fired if I don't do it.' I know people who have had sex with him and that's probably why they did. That's the most egregious part of the whole bargain. It wouldn't occur to him that he was taking advantage of them. But people I know that they were taken advantage of.

"The whole thing kind of sickens me. This man with all of this power feeling that he could do all of this as if it's not a big deal.

"It's pathetic that in order to be a happy man he'd have to go out and humiliate himself and do all this secret stuff.

"I always wanted to say to him, 'if you would just come out you could be so beneficial to gays instead of being this pathetic, secretive person.'"

From what can be surmised based on the available information, Forbes rarely had any long-term relationships with men since any attachments would naturally make it all that much more difficult to stay in hiding. He steered clear of gay establishments, having once even approached the disco club as Love Machine and Celebrity Club at the Tunnel, where the crowd was predominantly gay but was never listed as such or considered a gay club per se. Thus the contradiction of Forbes: While he tried to keep it all very hush-hush, he behaved many times in a sloppy, seemingly deliberate way, yearning to have fun, and testing the limits of living a closed life.

The result was that, unlike the cases of other, more cautious millionaires, lots of people got wind of Forbes' escapades. Certainly many of those who moved in his circles had been told a thing or two. And that meant people in the media.

"I'd heard all of the stories. You always heard the stories," says Newsday's James Revson. The Daily News' Billy Norwich reiterates: "Like anyone who traveled the circuit, I heard the rumors." And Michael Musto of the Village Voice wryly comments, "I always knew he was a friend of Dorothy—and I don't just mean Kilgallen." But the Daily News' Liz Smith, in a one-page statement faxed to OutWeek, claimed to be "too square" to have been privy to information regarding Forbes' homosexuality. Without addressing what she might or might not have been informed of regarding Forbes in the past, Smith speaks only of her personal relationship with the man. "The subject never came up at any time. I never saw any evidence of it. In fact, it never occurred to me," she states. "I must say he and I were both at an age where sex never came up as a topic of conversation." Smith goes on to refute claims that Forbes purposely used Elizabeth Taylor as a "beard" to make him appear heterosexual.

"I never saw any evidence of such pretense. Both of them said to me on several occasions that they were just friends. The romance was completely in the minds of the tabloids." But Smith herself has never stated that fact in her own column; she has never said these two were just friends. Quite to the contrary, she was one of the major perpetrators of the false Forbes/Taylor romance two years ago, trying to convince readers that they were a hot item.

But if Smith appears to be nervously fence-sitting, others are downright indignant. Many columnists, writers and editors, as well as others who worked for Forbes who knew of his gay life, became quite upset upon being approached by OutWeek, and refused to comment for this story. (The Forbes children, having been tipped off early on about this story, never returned my calls. Neither did editors at Forbes and Edge.)

"Why dig up all of this stuff?" angrily asked a one-time columnist who'd enjoyed a friendship with Forbes over the years. "I mean, what does it matter now?"

This was the attitude encountered from many both within the gay and lesbian community and among those straights who claim to be "liberal," "understanding" and "pro-gay."

"He was as good as gold," says Dan. "It didn't matter whether you were a fling or you meant something more. He treated people right.

"Actually, he rarely, if ever, had really long or involved relationships with men. From what I could gather he lived in such a medieval way. He was the King, who married the Queen just for the purposes of siring offspring. And then he went about just having quick flings and affairs. Of course, with men, I mean. I never, ever, ever heard of him having sex with women.

"Dan, as well as Ernest, independently identified one man by name who worked at the townhouse and who they say acted as a "headhunter" for Forbes' male sex partners. This person is described as being immensely good-looking. Part of his job, according to these sources, was to always be on the lookout for attractive young men who might work at the townhouse and be persuaded to have sex with Forbes.
"He always got great people," says Ernest. "Some really hot guys."

According to Dan, Forbes treated the "headhunter" extra-specially.

"He got Malcolm his boys," he says. "He was responsible for getting that fresh meat. So he was important. Malcolm had a special place for him."

According to Dan, at one point a couple of years ago, the headhunter had left Forbes' employ and moved to another state. This, he said, left Forbes so lost that when the headhunter decided to come back, at Forbes' bequest, Forbes sent out his private jet, The Capitalist Tool, to get all of his furnishings and belongings and get him back as soon as possible. Once back, he was given a better position in Forbes' empire, which he now occupies.

Is our society so overwhelmingly repressive that even individuals as all-powerful as the late Malcolm Forbes feel they absolutely cannot come out of the closet?

It would seem so. Much like Congressman Barney Frank before he came out, Forbes was the victim of a virulently homophobic society which he too fed into regularly. He was forced to lead a life of secret pursuits and dark, dirty doings; of exploitation and abuse. His own internalized homophobia far outweighed the commanding authority that any amount of dollars could possibly wield.

And what is the significance of bringing all of this out now?

First, for the sake of posterity the truth must be told. All too often history is distorted. One of the most influential men in America just died, and regardless of how we may or may not see him as a proper public figure, he was gay. And that must be recorded.

Second, it sends a clear message to the public at large that we are everywhere.

Third, perhaps gays and lesbians at all levels of society can learn a great deal from the story of Malcolm Forbes. In researching this piece, in an attempt to try to obtain more information about Forbes and get to people who were close to him, I came upon someone who knew the family very well and who would have been able to discuss intimate details about the man; not merely about sex, but about the real inner-workings of Forbes' mind. It was a person who could perhaps provide an insight into what Forbes thought about such issues as gay rights and AIDS. But, after considerable thought, he decided not to speak to me. Currently living a closeted existence with regard to his own family and business, he said, "My choice in speaking to you is between myself and the greater gay community. And— at this moment—I have to go with myself."

Ultimately, that was the tragedy of Malcolm Forbes' entire life. Under the guise, perhaps, of doing the best for "himself," Forbes initiated a senseless, self-imposed prison sentence which benefited no one.

Dear Readers:

A few weeks ago I asked you, my beloved readers, to submit your opinions as to whether or not sweaters were replacing shirts as the garment of choice these days. Although I had expected some measure of healthy and informed debate over the relative merits of the two apparel items, I was in no way prepared for the vehemence with which sweaters were attacked. Wool sweaters, in particular, drew heavy fire. In light of a recently released study detailing incidents of homosexual behavior among the animals at the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Sheep Experimental Station in Boise, Idaho (see OutWeek, No. 24, 12/3/89) many readers charged that the wearing of wool sweaters perpetuates the exploitation of our gay and lesbian comrades in the ovine community and thus detracts from our common struggle. (There are, I would imagine, deeper and more disturbing implications to be considered in this issue as Passover approaches but that's a different column altogether.)

I had promised to share with you the startling results of this survey as well as a cross-sampling of some of the more legible comments but, alas, this is not to be. When I arrived at the office this morning I discovered that my experts had broken in during the night, eaten all the candy corn in the jar on my desk and soaked the entire mailbag in Bombay Gin. A message scribbled in blue violet crayon on the wall read, in part: "This is what gin can do! Tell the public! Or else!!! The experts! P.S. We're not kidding! P.P.S. And where's our coffee maker?!!!!!!" All I could salvage from the mess was one letter from a reader who apparently thought we were still discussing Jane Fonda's Oscar upset in 1978.

Throughout the day I have received a series of phone calls during which the caller has belched and then hung up. I presume I am to regard these as threats of an indeterminate nature, much in the same way as I am coming to regard my experts. As you all well know by now, I have requested a meeting with their spokesperson (presumably Sandy, who has traditionally handled their contract negotiations in the past) in an attempt to contain this rapidly escalating controversy. They have replied (via a letter attached to a brick) that the time for negotiation has passed and they demand that forthwith all advice to be dispensed through this column must include, without variation, a warning that mixing gin with anti-depressants may result in death. Failure to comply with this demand, they warn, will result in a call for my resignation coupled with a publicity campaign denouncing me as—well, never mind the specifics of their wild and, I assure you, completely unsupported accusations. The point is that these are the tactics they have elected to employ. (You will note I say "elected." Throughout their tenure, these experts have exhibited utter disdain for the consensus process in which I, myself, am a firm believer.)

Needless to say, dear readers, this is not the first time (nor, I am sure, the last) I have been the target of persecution. Remind me sometime to tell you about my sophomore year at Lord Beaverbrook High School. As I have not in the past, I will not now acquiesce to these misguided hoodlums. If they wish to participate in rational discourse for the purpose of our mutual understanding and development, I will be, as I always have been, more than willing to oblige. If they want to get rid of me they will have to assassinate me.

ROGER AILES.

This is the man with whom Liz Smith (Daily News) has gleefully decided to host a TV commentary show on the Fox television network.

ROGER AILES.

The biggest homophobe of the 80s. The p.r. man behind Ronald Reagan, George Bush and Rudolph Giuliani. A man who has said some of the most horrendous, outrageous, anti-gay public statements of the past ten years.

A MAN WHO ALLEGEDLY TRIED TO STRANGLE AN AIDS ACTIVIST! And of course, this little sideshow is being put together by another self-hating phony, 20th Century Fox's Barry Diller. IT'S AKIN TO SAMUEL GOLDWYN PRODUCING AN HISTORICAL DRAMA STARRING NORMA SHEARER AND ADOLPH HITLER!

I am steaming mad. As usual.

I read the story in 7 Days; the one, which I'm sure you all read, with the headline, "Liz Smith Under Siege" (which, I guess, is supposed to make us feel sorry for this big, giant press whore who kisses the asses of the privileged so that perhaps they'll pet her and say, "There, there...yes, yes...good puppy!").

If there was ever a time that I thought that this woman who reaches millions of Americans every day was a dangerous monster it is now, after reading that article and hearing about her upcoming TV gig with Ailes. Liz Smith is the Joan Crawford of American journalism, so self-absorbed in her own glamour and so frighteningly out of touch with reality she knows not the harm she inflicts on her own people.

I could spend hours dissecting every sad word that this self-loathing, ageist, sexist, homophobe had to say in that creepy article. But, I'll stick to the ridiculous remarks made about me since I don't have that much space.

In response to slippery writer Jonathan Van Meter's question about what she thinks about that "OutWeek columnist who has harangued her," Liz says: "Oh those gay guys don't like me. I call them the beatnik fringe. I think they must be very frightened and desperate people. They're so hateful and irrational. Talk about not living-and-let-living. Who are they to tell everybody else how to live? I don't get it. I also think they're jealous of anybody that they think made it. I mean, what do they want me to be the great lesbian of the Western world? Forget it! If I was Sandra Bernhard, maybe. But even then I'm not so sure."

Well, Liz. First off, we're not just marial affair, cower in the corner whenever someone asks you about your private life. Instead of proudly answering and giving the truth, you freak out, become "frightened" and "desperate," and even reportedly threaten lawsuits.

Last week someone even overheard Jeannie Williams (USA Today), asking you if you were a lesbian. After all, she hears lots of things, reads OutWeek and certainly read what you said in 7 Days. But (though Williams declined to comment when I asked her about this), you were overheard responding, "You have no right asking me that." Really, Liz? But you have the right to ask and write about everyone else's personal life? And why is homosexuality so horrible that no one can ask questions about it? Don't you see the internalized homophobia here, Liz?

I was even told, by a friend who spoke to Time reporter J.D. Reed, that you threatened to sue Reed when he asked you about your personal relationship with archaeologist Iris Love and when he said that he simply wanted to print THE TRUTH in his recent article on you. I called Reed myself to ask if you had threatened a lawsuit, and, after a long pause, he said, "I'm...I'm not really...at liberty to answer that question. But you should call our corporate lawyers." They, of course, had no comment. You also had "no comment" when I called to ask you about this.

Liz, do you know how homophobic it is to threaten such a lawsuit? What would other Blacks think of a Black person who threatened to sue a magazine if they printed that he or she was Black?

As for your thinking that I am somehow "jealous" of your supposed success, let me set you straight on that too. I don't think you've "made it," Liz Smith. I consider you an embarrassing fool. I consider you a woman who, much like Malcolm Forbes, will be...
SEX IS SAFER ON WEDNESDAYS — Dean Johnson

Liz: Dean Johnson's Rock and Roll Fag Bar has once again moved—this time amidst much controversy. The closing of Fag Bar at Pyramid Club two weeks ago was sudden. So sudden that many showed up for it and were greeted with a sign on the Pyramid door reading "Politically Incorrect Fag Bar!" The visible changes we could see were drag queens dancing on the bar, go-go boys wearing clothes and the absence of the Testosteroom. Downstairs, The Wizard of Oz was being shown on the video monitors in the very bright lounge. (Sydney: I guess it was kind of like watching Peter Pan in the Bijou for most of the men who went into the basement.)

We decided to have one of those dykes-to-fag talks with Ron Dobrin, the new Pyramid manager and an openly gay man. In the midst of giving us his reasons for the firing, he said, "We're going to start advertising with OutWeek, and we hope we won't be getting any bad press from you." Sydney replied: "Press is press." He reiterated this sentiment by saying, "I hope we can keep advertising with you." His threats weren't exactly "write a bad story and we'll pull our ads," but he did mention in the same minute, that he was pulling his ads from The Village Voice because of the "bad press" he was expecting from them.

Now, aside from the fact that if he doesn't advertise with either the Voice or OutWeek, his only outlet for hot boys will be the Native, we don't take kindly to our stories being dictated by clubs.

According to Ron Dobrin, Johnson and others connected with Fag Bar were fired for these reasons:

—The most recent invitation for Fag Bar read: "A Stevie Nicks Tribute: bring your shawl! Bring your spoon! Coke dealers admitted free with this invite." The Pyramid feared cocaine purveyors would show up Wednesday night demanding entrance. (Earlier in the week, the manager of a Christopher Street clothing store asked us "What do you think Stevie Nicks will think when she gets there?")

—The Testosteroom was housing unsafe sexual activities with no monitor and no lighting of any sort (so that one could not see breaks in a condom). This is not the first time the Testosteroom has been controversial.

When Dobrin was asked about having a monitor for the room, he replied, "the Pyramid is not a sex club." Quite true, it's a club. But Dobrin has also made allegations against Village Voice columnist Michael Musto, charging that Musto was practicing unsafe sex in the Testosteroom. (Sydney: While the allegations about unsafe sex are a rumor, Dobrin, in the course of our chat, stated that the Pyramid would be getting bad press from the Village Voice because Michael Musto was a regular patron of the Testosteroom.) Musto refutes both of these versions and is considering legal action against the Pyramid and Dobrin. Several Fag Bar regulars (that is, every week) can vouch that Musto has set foot inside exactly once, a night before the Testosteroom was open. Asked why the Pyramid would be smearing him, Musto said that on a call to get Dobrin's side of the Fag Bar fiasco, Dobrin "freaked out" while... he was simply trying to get the club's reaction to allegations of unsafe sex practices in the Testosteroom.

In response, Dean Johnson has claimed greed and homophobia as the motives for his firing. He claims there where monitors in the Testosteroom, that the invocation was joke and that the sex on Wednesdays was far safer than on the weekends, when the crowd is predominantly straight (except, of course, on Sunday).

Pyramid insists that the bottom line reason for the firings was concern for their license. How Musto got into this no one quite understands. For right now, Hapi Phase, who so kindly offered to take over, will now be doing Wednesday nights, as well as his regular Backdoor Cabaret. Meanwhile Dean has moved Fag Bar to Woody's in the Village, conveniently located across the street from The Bar.

Sydney:"Paris is Burning", the working title of a film about the House Ball scene in New York by Jennie Livingston and Barry Swimmer, paves the on the hand that there is little difference between the club scene and the ball scene; both revolve around faux glamor, artificial society, and limited fame. On the other hand, it also exposes the difference—while both ball kids and club kids believe that they can ride the scene to mainstream fame, being black, gay and, in most cases, poor, provides an added urgency to "make it" out of the scene. The film features some of the best lines—like one queen explaining the difference between reading and shade. Reading is telling someone how ugly they are while shade is saying something like this: "I don't have to tell you how ugly you are, because you are, because you already know what an ugly queen you are." Or David, the father of House of Xtravaganza, explaining that the house loves its mother, Angie, so much they paid for her tits. They then sing: "All she wants for Christmas is her two front tits."

The film ends with a startling juxtaposition: Willi Ninja, a cross-over success, tells us that he paid for his Gaultier earring ("I have the receipt somewhere") and has his foot in a lot of different doors (like Lambada—he is a Lambada dancer at Palladium) and Angie tells the story of going down to the morgue and identifying the body of Venus Xtravaganza, a pre-op TS hustler interviewed in the film. (Venus' dream was to have a "sex change, adopt children and live in the Peekskills."

Besides being untrue, these invites are also utterly offensive. Yet another invitation we are none too happy with, though we ove the host: Lahoma Van Zandt's Love Connection invites men to "meet that special someone through the magic of video" while women are asked to "tease him with subtle innuendo." If men can meet a special someone of an unspecified gender, why must women be forced into teasing a "him"? One final note: Gorgeous photos of the late Keith Haring were exhibited at Red Zone by nightlife photographer Tina Paul. He is pictured at a number of events and places, from the Paradise Garage to the Love Ball, proving that he was and will be remembered as an important figure in gay culture and as an artist and influential personality.

Gossip Watch from page 49 remembered not for what you have done for humanity and for the gay and lesbian community—your community—but, rather, for sucking up to Barbara Walters. I think on this one you've got it switched too, Liz. See, I think I've "made it." I'm in a position where I can live my life openly and freely with no skeletons in my closet and do work that has redeeming social value and may do some good in this world.

You, meanwhile, talk in that article about your four friends who were "dying" of AIDS. And yet you only build up and praise the homophobes who are killing them. You never make any plea for the government to do something. And when you write about your friends' deaths, you say that they died of "brain tumors."

Then, to top it all off, you sign a deal to do a TV show with a man who was one of those directly responsible for your friends' deaths, Liz. Meanwhile, you talk about being too exhausted going to the hospital to see them. You, Liz, may as well pull out the plugs on them. It's less painful.

As for Jonathan Van Meter, who wrote the piece: YOU ARE A PHONEY!

Playing a dangerous game, you are one of the new breed of self-loathers who do a balancing act. You try to appease me, since, as you expressed to me on the telephone once, you're afraid of me. But at the same time you try to kiss up to the people whom you ultimately want to pal around with.

It is no coincidence that your three most recent stories have been about people whom I stirred up controversy about. First it was Mark Kostabi, then Pat Buckley, then Liz Smith. You latch on to these people because controversy makes them hot, then you make the controversy more or less one of the key issues of the interview. But you never mention where it all started. In the Kostabi piece I was sloughed off as "an activist" who threw butter at him.

In the Buckley interview you don't refer to me at all and I was the one who first attacked her and the reason why ACT UP finally decided to protest the benefit. You knew this, since you called me to have me feed you every one of my columns as background.

Then, in the Liz Smith piece, I'm "that OutWeek columnist." Van Meter, you are playing a tricky little game. But you're caught now. How unprofessional.

But let's tell everyone how really unprofessional you are. Let's tell how you ran around party after party for the past few weeks, carrying a drink in your hand, and telling everyone that Liz Smith was "coming out" in your article and how it was the story of your career. Let's tell everyone how I then got wind of it and called you. Let's tell everyone how you became all flustered and freaked out. Let's tell everyone how your editors at 7 Days were so infuriated that they called a "breach of security" meeting. Let's tell everyone how the story, when it finally appeared, was hardly a "coming out" story and how everyone is laughing at you.

Now, put that on your résumé to Vanity Fair.
to recreate himself, though, was his liaison with Elizabeth Taylor. He usually spent too much money indulging his whims to bother with charitable causes, but there was one cause he was interested in, mostly out of self-interest, and that was AIDS research. Like any gay man, he was very interested in seeing AIDS cured. The only problem was how to give a lot of money to the cause and get a lot of publicity, without giving rise to rumors about his sexuality. His solution, one must hand it to him, was brilliant: Give the money within the context of a well-publicized heterosexual relationship. Thus was born one of the great non-romances of the 80s—Malcolm and Liz. As their relationship dominated the media, Forbes was free to go out in the company of more young men, giving rise to the caption in gossip columns “Malcolm and friend” (not unlike when your mother says, “How is your, uh, ‘friend?’”)

While he partied with some of the decade’s most notorious homophobes and his magazine towed an even more reactionary line, something had to give. Then last June his rabidly right-wing editor printed an article called “Straight Talk on AIDS” whose basic premise was that only Blacks and gays were going to get AIDS so money spent on research was being wasted. Forbes was caught between his conservative bedfellows and his own self-interest. He risked looking like a hypocrite or at least an idiot giving so much money to AIDS research on the one hand and printing an article in his magazine saying it was foolish to do so on the other. The day after that issue’s deadline, he was leaving the country for two weeks. He claims he didn’t see the article before it went into the magazine, this may be true, though I and a few other disgusted employees sent him copies of the story before he left. Most likely he was waiting to see if anyone saw the article, hoping it would die unnoticed without his having to take a stand. But people did notice it. Although I wasn’t a member of ACT UP at the time, I knew exactly who to go to. Two weeks later, about 40 protesters welcomed Forbes home, while a group snuck inside and planted something in it, because he was nervous or angry, or if it couldn’t tell if his eye was twitching because there was something in it, because he was nervous or angry, or if it was a crude attempt to wink salaciously. He began to spit out his words.

“And I think, I think,” he stuttered, “that’s it, great that we live in a country where, uh, y-y-y-you can lead your own p-p-p-private life, and that no one, no one can tell you how to, uh, live your life. That’s why we live in a free country.”

“Good,” he snapped, “then we’re in 100 percent agreement!” He smiled again, thinking this was the end of it.

“Well, actually,” I said, “we’re not.”

The smile left his face and he plunged into a group of people, turning his back on me.

“I’d like to discuss this issue with you further some other time,” I yelled after him.

“We just did talk about it. Now that’s it,” he said angrily, retreating to smiles and handshakes.

I don’t know what he expected him to say. At least he didn’t shrink back in horror and protest, “What, me gay?” Any hope of his doing anything really important with his life for the gay and lesbian community is over. Everyone now knows the life he led was a sham, but his homosexuality will be treated as something that was too horrible to be revealed while he was alive. It will be a character flaw, a skeleton in the closet that “respectable” biographies will skirt over and homophobic family members will no doubt deny.
If you have sex with other men, no matter how infrequently, always use latex condoms.

Ten Cents a Dance?

by Peter Bowen

Lost in Madrid several years ago, I tried to find myself in a copy of the "Guia Gai" I bought on the street. Loitering among the ads for American gay porno and the ungrammatical warnings ("be carefully") was the persistent phrase, "rent boys." For the sodomitical tourist, gay guides routinely explain where and how boys can be "rented" in undeveloped countries. In fact, specialized tourist agencies regularly exploit the inequalities of world trade to provide Westerners and Japanese with special vacation packages where cheap labor provides hours of equally cheap pleasure. What is, of course, omitted from these trade pages of international desire is the complex socio-economic conditions which create the "service economy" they exploit. Lino Brocka's new film, Macho Dancer, turns such vacation plans inside out by telling the complicated labor story of Philippino Macho Dancer.

In making a film about the economic and political conditions of male prostitution, Brocka has been no less prostituted by the complex political conditions which govern Philippino film production and international distribution. Unable to make the film under the repressive Marcos regime, Brocka, who has produced his share of exploitative pot-boilers as well as "political" films, has found the Aquino government slightly more encouraging, but no less censoring. The film, which stands, according to Broca, as "an indictment against the government as well" as the police which control the sex and drug trades was, not surprisingly, rejected by the government censor board for presenting too negative an image of Philippino youth. Unable to secure a governmental authorization, Broca was subsequently charged with smuggling after presenting the film at a Toronto film festival.

While controversial, the film's representation of gay desire is equally complicated. Touted as a "gay" film, its story of a country boy, Pol (Allan Paule), moving to Manila to seek richer clients after his G.I. lover/patron returns to the states, suggests the poverty of such convenient western terms as gay/straight to define the actual contours of sex and desire in Philippino culture. For alongside one's personal desire hangs the more financially important price tag of their desirability as a sexual object. Pol, who easily fucks with men for money, ultimately falls in love with a female sex worker, Bambi Oacyln Jose), who finally rejects his utopian dreams of heterosexual marriage for more realistic business plans. And even as Pol is positioned as ostensibly straight, the film recognizes an unrequited and unclarified relationship between him and his co-worker/roommate, Noel (Daniel Fernando).

Indeed, while the film unapologetically portrays same-sex activity (gay porn, prostitution, floor shows of boys jerking off See DANCE on page 64

First Voice:
After the slick seductiveness of Black Widow (1986), the steamy silliness of The Postman Always Rings Twice (1981) and the countercultural cool of Five Easy Pieces (1970), who would have picked Bob Rafelson as the heir to David Lean? But there it is: an epic, historical adventure of the sort you thought they didn't make anymore.

Mountains of the Moon is the story of the quest for the legendary source of the Nile by English adventurer Captain (later Sir) Richard Burton and his protégé (later rival) John Speke. It features gruesome battles, noble savages, fantastic landscapes, comely native women, a hot hetero romance (between Burton and his fiancée), intrigue and safe social commentary—all the ingredients of a classic of an often-botched genre. And it feels like a movie from a different age. Rafelson has no interest in making a preachy allegory like The Mission, and he doesn't attempt to modernize the characters in order to glibly deconstruct the 19th century, as in Greystoke. The issues are straightforward and old-fashioned: loyalty, bravery, integrity to one's ideals.

Everything is neatly, beautifully, even powerfully set forth, and as the adventure steams forward past natural obstacles, threats of death and apparent dead-ends, it's clear we're being driven to sympathize with the utter irresistibility of Burton's passion for the alien, his vision of exploration as immersion in the element—an experience of the moment rather than an excuse for later laurels.

Second Voice: That's just it, of course. It's all much too neat. The agenda is so clearly delineated because it's a closed system, and what's shut out is any real examination of baser motives and historical implications. David Denby has already pointed out the movie's complete failure to consider Britain's imperialistic intentions. I might easily add to that list the movie's inability to deal with class except as a device to differentiate the main characters, poor Scotsman Burton and aristocratic Englishman Speke, as well as the film's handy endorsement of machismo, the sexism implicit in its preference for things "masculine" and, perhaps most glaring, its heterosexism.

But the film should not be slighted for what it chooses not to deal with. The photography is stunning and the lead actors—Patrick Bergin as Burton and Iain Glen as Speke—perform handsomely, with broad strokes yet great depth and even nuance of character. To dump 20th century issues into the laps of these Victorians would be entirely inappropriate.

Except that it's not a Victorian film—it's a movie of the 90s. It's no longer appropriate, for example, to hint at homosexuality whenever you want to question a character's integrity. Mountains of the Moon does that not once, but twice. It implies repeatedly that Speke may be motivated by a repressed gay love for Burton, and then it shamelessly indicates that the repulsive publisher—the movie's only real villain, who urges Speke to betray Burton—simply wants the young blond to himself.

Making the publisher gay was certainly gratuitous, but Glen's performance incorporates Speke's sexual ambiguity into a whole complex of repression, insecurity and moral turmoil. It's one significant tension in a movie that weaves an

by Monica Dorenkamp

At the beginning of The Handmaid's Tale, the main character Kate (Natasha Richardson) gets caught while attempting to cross the border into Canada from the Republic of Gilead, formerly the United States. It is the first indication of conditions in this "recent future" than an opening title tells us we are in. And it is an appropriate one, for borders and the controlling of them are what this film is all about.

Run by right-wing fundamentalists, Gilead has erased all cultural and ethnic difference (people of color are sent to the toxic-waste filled colonies) to produce a homogenous, white, patriarchal state with a strict class system. Positions within the system are color-coded by dress, making who you are less identifiable—and certainly less important—than what you are. Handmaids are dressed in bright red.

Margaret Atwood, on whose novel the film is based, got the idea for her story from an episode in Genesis; Rachel, unable to bear children, instructs her husband to sleep with her handmaid, Bilhah, so that she may bear children for her. In futuristic Gilead, one of the effects of years of nuclear accidents and environmental neglect has been to leave most women infertile. Those who still are able to bear children become handmaids, and are assigned to commanders (in dark blue) and their wives (in an offensively bright blue), between whom they must lie in a sex "ceremony."

At the training center for handmaids Kate meets Moira (Elizabeth McGovern) who was picked up for "gender treachery," that is, as she explains further, for "liking girls." In a fundamentalist state where the boundaries around what is acceptable sex—heterosexual sex for reproductive purposes—are as strongly policed as country borders, lesbian or gay sex...

Icing on the Cakewalk

by Michael Paller

Ohio has given America six presidents. Their luck (and ours) was not good. Three were utter mediocrities, three died in office. Warren Gamaliel Harding (1921-23) belonged to both groups. As the new musical, Capitol Cakewalk points out, Harding had the profile of Francis X. Bushman. That was about it for his head. He had enormous appetites for food and women, a nature astonishingly trusting and naive and a gift for resonating, empty rhetoric which he truly believed. He also had—or was rumored to have had—a Black or mulatto grandmother.

The latter is the ostensible reason why a company of Black actors, led by the late president's cousin Alma (Sharon Hope), is producing a musical version of his life in 1924. Set in a rundown Harlem auditorium optimistically called the New Renaissance, Harding's story is paralleled by the efforts of Big Jim Moses (Adrian Bailey plays both) to keep the theater open. Once the proud possession of Big Jim's father, the theater is now about to be closed by the city for numerous building violations. Big Jim is enticed to sell out to a shady Black gangster called H.P. (Jack Landron) who plans to turn the place into a speakeasy. A few of the actors, who believe that Alma's story of a Black president is just too uppity and would make folks nervous, abet H.P.. Harding's story ends unhappily (just as he begins to learn of the enormous raids his cabinet and appointees are making on the national treasury, he dies); Big Jim triumphs.

Bailey is an actor of great appeal. He has an unknowing smile which announces himself as a man open for business to every passing shyster, and a knowing eye for the women who throw themselves at him at every opportunity. If Bailey succeeds less well as Big Jim, it's because there's little part there. Jack Waddell plays Harding's campaign manager and manipulator Harry Daugherty with such an astonishing grace (beginning with his first entrance, a nifty soft-shoe duet with the also-graceful Jeffrey Smith) that one feels the urge to throw a spotlight on him and politely ask the other actors to leave us alone for awhile.

As the long-suffering Mrs. Harding, Minette Coleman makes the most of her essentially clichéd opportunities. Tena Wilson is the longer-suffering mistress who follows Warren to the White House and presents him with a new citizen eligible to vote in 21 years.

Tom O'Horgan has directed the piece as a cartoon. Perry Arthur Kroeger's sets are whimsical and many of the props are oversized, as is much of the acting (the costumes have been decidedly ignored; most are 1990s suits standing in for turn-of-the-century fashions). The broad style of acting and production doesn't seem to suit the theme, but then, it's hard to discern what the theme is.

The book, by Elmer Kline and Perry Arthur Kroeger, offers no special perspective on this Black president. Alma's story views Harding simply as a good man bad men took advantage of. The rumors regarding his ancestry are treated as only one episode among many in his life; everything about Harding is white. There is an odd lack of irony in the play: it could be performed by a white cast and it wouldn't matter.

Just what do Big Jim and the others think of this president who sings the praises of debenture bonds, a mi-

Freedom of Speech... My Ass!

ICE-T, supposed champion of freedom the world over, is at it again. This L.A. rapper who can nary sing a song without showing his utter hatred for women and lesbians and gay men has taken his oppressive stage show to new heights, and one should wonder just how far his "freedom march" will go. (Could his hatred for women be seen as something far more complex than macho insecurity? Doesn't rap music promote the ultimate in male bonding?)

It's time to scream "enough is enough." It's time that we turn the tide, showing the music industry that ultimately, only the society/consumer will determine what is and is not acceptable behavior from a fellow human being.

If the following documented instances of hatred and oppression (compiled by Jim Fouratt) anger you, it's time to get angry in a way that counts: by making life miserable for the people who are profiting the most from this shit—the record companies themselves.

ICE-T is a rap artist signed to Warner Brothers records. His production company has been signed by Epic records, a division of CBS records, to produce a series of Rap records that ICE-T, himself, will produce.

ICE-T performed at the New Music Seminar last July in New York City, at the Rapp Arts Center. His performance exhibited some of the most blatant misogynistic and homophobic behavior seen from any major Rap artist. Activities included his pulling a female fan out of the audience and trying to tear her clothes off while he rapped to the audience about what he was going to do to her. Such blatant violence prompted a young woman watching to turn to another, with terror in her voice and say, "I'm going to be raped tonight."

ICE-T was a featured speaker at the College Music Journal's annual conference in October 1989. He was championed as a frontline fighter in the anti-censorship/free speech battle. His speech was replete with misogynistic and homophobic language. He received a STANDING ovation.

ICE-T recently toured Australia and New South Wales in support of his Warner Brothers records. BLK, a national lesbian and gay journal published in Los Angeles, reports a story in its February 1990 issue verified by Outrage, the Australian lesbian and gay magazine. The story reported that ICE-T "...on tour in Sidney, Australia, pissed off at least half of his audience at BASE, a popular nightclub, when he gave his approval from the stage to 'bash poofs' to a vocal minority at the front of the audience who were chanting 'Bash Poofs.'"

Radio Station ZJJJ, which sponsored the concert, reportedly received numerous calls the following day demanding they account for the Black rapper's statements.

Dance

Fandastic

Lar Lubovitch Dance Company.
City Center. 131 W. 55th Street. Closed.

by Otis Stuart

Choreographer Lar Lubovitch took on two big ones for the recent engagement of his Lar Lubovitch Dance at City Center. Fandango, the first of Lubovitch's two premieres, was a duet set to music that, to date, has been given its just choreographic desserts. Host to a host of abominable ballets, Ravel's "Bolero" just can't relax its poke-me insistence long enough to let in a dance. Lubovitch's second new work for his modern dance ensemble, From Paris to Jupiter, was set to Mozart, a composer who screams for pointe shoes.

At the very least, Fandango was a highpoint as the dance that broke the "Bolero" losing streak. Lubovitch's Rhapsody in Blue for New York City Ballet's American Music Festival in 1988 rethought a score that had become familiar to the point of irritation, and Fandango did the same thing. Rather than dive headlong into the swell of the music, dragging us along kicking and screaming, Lubovitch channeled the flow into eddying vignettes, each circling around a couple that just can't decide who's on top.

Fandango did tap into one aspect of the "Bolero" tradition. Its audience is proof. "Bolero" is designed to rouse the house—reverberations of the riot that greeted the score's premiere still attend every performance—and Fandango did just that. In every other respect, the work was its own climax. The scaling series of sexual skirmishes, each unfinished and aching for more, brought the dance a quality "Bolero" can't—ambiguity, a sense of questions rather than set answers. The physical couplings, including doggie style, keep the relationship open-ended, and the dance

Morals are for little people.
Murder has its sexual side."

The writing on the walls of New York City spelled out what we were up against. It was wild to me when Keith’s hieroglyphics appeared on the blank spaces in the subway stations: the radiant child on a Penthouse playmate’s tits, the barking dogs always at the wrong tree, the tragi-comic struggle between good and evil, cryptographic portraits of revolution and evolution confronting you as animation vis-a-vis the methods of rapid transit. I used to watch out the windows of the train his pictures go by in the stations I didn’t stop at. On the morning after a rambunctious night of drawing by Keith you could see as many as five new pieces on the Lexington Ave. #6 between Astor Place and 68th St. It was the most brilliant display of public art I’d ever seen. I liked graffiti, and don’t disparage it, but this shit had a cohesive statement that overwhelmed 99 percent of the homeboy scrawl on the wall that’d grown accusutomed to my face.

Fortunately the work was documented by Keith’s illustrious cohort,
Tseng Kwong Chi, camera safari guide par excellence, who’d follow the footsteps interborough.

The subway art involved fancy footwork. Robert Parris Thompson’s book African Art in Motion brought my attention to the coincidental relationship of movement in Yoruba art to the footsteps interborough.

The transmitter may be gone, but the wave goes on.

I became friends with Keith Haring while he was picking up bottles at the Mudd Club and I was checking coats. I remember the first time Keith sold a painting. He called up and took a whole bunch of us out on the town. He was always that way. Keith shared what he had with everyone that was around him. I spent many years close to Keith, marvelling at the kindness and generosity the flowed from him as abundantly as his work. Being an artist myself, it was very inspiring to watch him succeed and grow. It was also intimidating and even quite difficult at times, naturally wanting to achieve those successes myself. Keith was very supportive of my work, inviting me to collaborate with him and Grace Jones, and he even commissioned a few pieces so I could pay back loans he had made to me in my times of need. He once said that I worked harder than any artist he knew, as I diligently created the day-glo jewelry and costumes we wore so many nights at the beloved Paradise Garage. Keith was a good friend, a brother and a shining light. I feel lucky to have been in the company of this wonderful man.

—David Spada

Keith Haring, the great artist we all know. He was accessible and giving to all who wanted to be a part of it. And many were, and will continue.

But the Keith I think about most and miss, was my friend Keith. His silly sense of humor, his driving passion and his total honesty about everything. The excitement he used to incite, just by being around him, was always a charge. His abounding energy would emanate from him into everyone around. Keith really cared about people and was full of love to the very end. I miss him deeply.

—Kenny Scharf

Keith was my friend. I can’t believe he isn’t here in New York. I can’t even believe the clarity he found here, how he made sense of this city and how he managed to make an impact on it with draw-

Keith Haring was a Hero. He was both a profound artist and humanitarian. His relentlessly accessible style made him both controversial and appealing. The concept of accessibility in the contemporary art world is a "tough nut to swallow" in an arena where people play the art market with the aplomb of high-rolling capitalists. Keith’s aesthetic also took on humanitarian proportions as witnessed in his Free South Africa poster, done at a time when freeing South Africa was not in vogue. He sold huge gorgeous posters for one dollar each, or the fliers he made for the anti-nuke rally in Central Park where he passed out over 30,000 himself, or his subway art, valentines and New Year greetings to the people of New York many years running. His many mural projects with children (how he must have made them feel "all things are possible"), and his going ahead with the Pop Shop when most people warned him that it would jeopardize his high art standing. Yet, he insisted people should have multiples when they and simulating soapy stage sex), free and freely expressed gay desire is the film's subtle secret. Invited to Manila by his friend, Greg (Bobby Samo), who unsuccessfully waits for a plane ticket from a Japanese client to materialize, the new boy, Pol, is invited by a fellow "macho dancer" Noel to live with him. In becoming friends the two agree to search for Noel's lost sister, Pining (Princess Punzalan). While their search through the numerous Manila sex shops serves as a clumsy plot device to unveil a dangerous subculture of prostitution, drugs and police corruption, it also pieces together an ambiguous love affair between the two men.

It is the film's uneasy recognition of desire, in a world where desire is so easily bought and sold, that seems most poignant. At once tender and confused, the boys' "affair" can never be clearly divorced from the economic and political reality which frames it. Prostituting himself to save his sister from prostitution, Noel unsuccessfully attempts to seduce Pol at the moment of his greatest pain. In the end, after Noel is killed by the police during a successful attempt to rescue his sister from sex slavery, and after Pol revenges his friend's death by killing the murdering police official, Kid (Johnny Vicar), Pol recognizes his feelings for Noel by flashing-back to sexy shower dance they both performed on stage. Unable to be freed from its economic reality, male gay desire can nevertheless be mediated through it.

Such economic realities are what produce the film's most profound and enlightening contradictions. Advertised as gritty "true-life" exposé of gay life in Manila, the film remains bound both to the melodramatic narrative that defines much of Philippine film production and to a heterosexual love story. In revealing the danger of such life, the film fails to mention the increasingly real danger of AIDS or the possible protection of condoms. Rather than detracting the "reality" of film, such contradictions reveal the unique structure of this society. And although the kisses exchanged between the two heroes on stage have been completely bought and paid for, they remain, as Pol's flashback suggests, kisses after all.

intricate network of competing forces—personal, social and narrative. First and foremost, it's an incredible story, skillfully told, and with a directness that's been missing from historical epics for years. Rafelson elicits that sense of history-become-legend that has eluded more self-conscious and self-righteous filmmakers like Hugh Hudson; Richard Attenborough and even Bernardo Bertolucci.

But isn't it about time that new legends ceased to incorporate old, prejudicial myths? Not only does Rafelson present confused and evil gays, he has the usual assortment of dupable Africans and pliant women. Is this sort of stereotyping permissible simply on the grounds of genre?

The essence of genre is exclusion. Should a coherent mode of expression be forbidden on the grounds of inherently shaky politics? Mountains of the Moon must be judged on its own anachronistic terms, or what you're judging isn't the movie, but it's entire cultural construct.

Exactly. I rest my case.

is reason to be sent to the colonies. Moira is saved from such a fate only because she is fertile.

Moira and Kate become as good friends as they possibly can given the extraordinarily de-humanizing circumstances in which they find themselves. They are refreshingly—and often frustratingly—sane in the midst of the bizarre ritualistic trainings they must endure. The dystopian vision of the film is made more real by their conscious, though often silent, resistances to it. Together they play out what are the only possibilities in such conditions; where Kate patiently, frustratedly waits, Moira plans several risky escapes. Neither choice ever seems quite possible.

When Kate is assigned to an important commander (Robert Duvall) and his wife, Serena Joy (Faye Dunaway), she enters a space of picture-perfect suburbanism, the lawns just a little too green, the flowers a little too abundant (the film was shot in North Carolina). The atmosphere is reminiscent of The Stepford Wives.

Because Kate is transported from place to place in the film in cars with blackened windows, we never get a clear sense of where things are and what the distances between them might be. The fragmented perspective reflects Kate's own. She gets her world as we do; in bits and pieces. And all the time that she is watching, there is a sense of being watched. Surveillance, in the form of a rotating pyramid with an eye on each side (very much like the pyramid on the back of a dollar bill), is a theme of this country.

Any dystopian vision raises questions about what has informed it. In a note included in the promotional material, Atwood says that when her novel was published in the United States the reaction was not the "shouts of 'paranoid,' 'impossible' and 'ridiculous,'" that she had expected. Instead she was asked the question of "How long have we got, and how can we prevent it?" evidence that her ideas are not really so fantastic. Indeed, one of the most effective things about the film is just how very familiar everything looks. There is no attempt to seem futuristic in any technological sense. The TV is still the central electronic device, endlessly reporting news of "the war."

More haunting though are the relations between the characters. (The film is extraordinarily well-acted, perhaps due to a very good script by Harold Pinter.) Although their positions have been exaggerated, made more extreme in this society, much of the tension between them is all too familiar. Serena Joy, who watches old tapes of her evangelical show, becomes the restless, dissatisfied housewife trying desperately to console herself about her life. And even when the commander has Kate illegally visit him in his study every evening—to play scrabble and to talk—we never doubt his devotion to the system that gives him the power to choose to do such things. His seemingly kind gestures—giving Kate old copies of long-banned magazines—at once show him to be conscious of her position and to condone it.

Gilead represents a society in which men decide what it is that will make women happy. Babies and the nuclear family are what are treasured; although handmaids are expected to be passive servants, they are told they should feel privileged, and some do. The central and difficult irony is that when she is caught and sent to the handmaid's training center, Kate is torn from her own child and husband. Images of her daughter haunt her throughout the film and her own position as a mother problematically threatens to trivialize her victimization over, say, Moira's. The fact that Kate is pregnant again at the end of the film, and not with the commander's child, also raises questions. Where on the one hand, Kate's pregnancies represent the possibility of an independent choice that she is robbing of as handmaid, they could also represent a more subdued version of the desperate need that the wives have to define themselves, and each other, in terms of children.

But such ironies complicate the film in a way that is good, showing us that there is no all-or-nothing way out of life's daily complications. It is good to keep in mind that the story, insofar as it must have a hopeful, if not happy, ending, is Kate's because she is in many ways conventional. It is good to keep in mind that this could not be Moira's story. Although we see, with Kate, bits and pieces of Moira's story, it is obvious that she could not end with the hope that heterosexual union and motherhood bring to Kate's. It is difficult to determine whether Moira's presence is a critique of such contemporary values that may eventually produce a Gilead, or if it is a reinforcement of them. Either way, the film is good insofar as it questions and provides no easy answers.

built to that last blast of brass rather than faking the orgasm.

Mozart, of course, is even tougher stuff, and the first testament to Lubotich's success with From Paris to Jupiter was the fact that has dance managed the music's most elusive quality, the combination of the antic and the formal that reads as half sweet, half smartassed and always smart. Lubotich set the work to Symphony No. 40, part of Mozart's last great burst of symphonic sailing, and the spaciousness of the music was perfect partner to the airiness of Lubotich's choreographic architecture and, in particular, to Lubotich's particular specialty, the free-flowing phalanxes of dancers who flood the stage with muscular imagery.

In fact, the match of music and movement was almost deceptively smooth. As in Lubotich's 1985 Brahms Symphony, which opened the program, the modus operandi of From Paris to Jupiter is perpetual motion, creating a peculiar paradox—the beautiful dance that got away. The tide of humanity that rushes across the first movement of Brahms Symphony sculpts an entire universe of activity that evanesces on sight. The community of commedia courtiers in From Paris to Jupiter are equally elusive. Because Lubotich's images are never lingering—they don't hang out—we are not allowed to hold on to traditional focuses. We don't have the time to, because the images are as transitory as they are thoughtful. They're here—and then gone. However carefully crafted, and Lubotich is one of an endangered species of choreographer who works with a dancer's entire body, we can't keep the dances. It's one of the reasons why Lubotich's dances have their signature trace of melancholy.

Problems remained. Mozart's zinging filigree, for example, can undercut the breath and strength of Lubotich's modern dance vocabulary, forcing small, tight phrases that make the dancers—look bitty rather than delicate. More often, however, Lubotich's choreography exercised the full range of his dancers' considerable skill. Lubotich's dancers are a paradox of their own—an ensemble of soloists who make the group as focal a point of the proceedings as the solo figures who break away to claim centerstage, and who are not too shabby either. Lubotich's company, like his choreography, manages the trickiest balance of all—physical abandon and technical clarity.

lion dollars in the bank and other privileges not available to Blacks who, unlike Harding, can't pass? They seem to think he's just fine. We're told that Harding shocked the nation by delivering a speech calling for equal economic and civil rights for all citizens (why don't we see it?), and for that reason, Alma considers him great. But even in Capitol Cakewalk, the only great thing about this president, whose idea of "normalcy" effectively excluded all but male WASPs from his cherished American Dream, was his capacity for delusion. Nor is it clear what Big Jim's struggle to save his theater has to do with Harding's serenely faceless stroll through life. Looking beyond the score and performances, one detects a play in danger of a thematic collapse.

So one doesn't look too hard. The pleasures provided by Bailey, Waddell, Waldo and company are rare enough to deserve your full attention.

y strongest memories of Keith are when we were laughing together and being silly. The way I laugh used to make Keith laugh, so when I laughed, he laughed at me and with me. He would always cover his mouth when he laughed and had a "hee, hee, hee" giggle. I'll always remember the fun times we had laughing. I miss them already—Min Sanchez

Keith Haring's death from AIDS has left a great many people with a profound sense of loss. His death at such a young age was tragic, yet the life he lived will forever be celebrated and remembered. I consider myself blessed to have been a friend of Keith's for the last 11 years and to have had the opportunity to enjoy his sense of fun, his unique artistic vision and his desire to live life to its fullest. I will always treasure the opportunity to have been touched by his love, friendship, talent, generosity and positive outlook towards life. It is hard to believe he is no longer with us, as he had been such an important part of so many people's lives. —Kitty Brophy
